

TERMS OF PUBLICATION. The Standard is published every Thursday morning by W. W. Alvord and J. J. Clauson, at the office of the Standard, in the building on the corner of the Court House and the Standard Building. Advertising in all cases exclusive of subscription. The price of the Standard is $2 per Annum in Advance. Single Copies 10 Cents. The Standard is published every Thursday morning by W. W. Alvord and J. J. Clauson, at the office of the Standard, in the building on the corner of the Court House and the Standard Building. Advertising in all cases exclusive of subscription. The price of the Standard is $2 per Annum in Advance. Single Copies 10 Cents.

PROFESSIONAL GARDS. JAMES WOOD, ATTORNEY AND COUNSELLOR AT LAW, TOWANDA, PA. HENRY PEET, ATTORNEY AT LAW, TOWANDA, PA. WM. FOYLE, ATTORNEY AT LAW, TOWANDA, PA. GEORGE D. MONTAGNE, ATTORNEY AT LAW, TOWANDA, PA. A. PECK, ATTORNEY AT LAW, TOWANDA, PA. P. WILLIAMS, ATTORNEY AT LAW, TOWANDA, PA. W. H. CARNOCHAN, ATTORNEY AT LAW, TOWANDA, PA. JOHN N. CALIFF, ATTORNEY AT LAW, TOWANDA, PA. OVERTON & ELSBREE, ATTORNEYS AT LAW, TOWANDA, PA. R. M. PECK, ATTORNEY AT LAW, TOWANDA, PA. MERCUR & DAVIES, ATTORNEYS AT LAW, TOWANDA, PA. JOHN W. MIX, ATTORNEY AT LAW, TOWANDA, PA. H. A. MCKEAN, ATTORNEY AT LAW, TOWANDA, PA. W. B. KELLY, DENTIST, OF- FICE ON WILKINSON ST., TOWANDA, PA. D. R. DUSENBERY, Associate Practitioner, permanently located, TOWANDA, PA. C. M. TINGLEY, Licensed Au- diother, TOWANDA, PA. DR. H. A. BARTLETT, Physician, TOWANDA, PA. AMOS PENNYPACKER, HAS RECENTLY OPENED HIS OFFICE AT TOWANDA, PA. U. BEACH, M. D., Physician, TOWANDA, PA. DOCTOR O. LEWIS, A GRADUATE OF THE COLLEGE OF PHYSICIANS AND SURGEONS, TOWANDA, PA. CAMP & VINCENT, INSURANCE AGENTS, TOWANDA, PA. LEWIS RHEIBEN, Fashionable Tailor, TOWANDA, PA. POWELL, REAL ESTATE DEALER, No. 103 Washington Street, TOWANDA, PA. DRESS-MAKING, PATTERNS CUTTING AND FITTING IN ALL FASHIONABLE STYLES, TOWANDA, PA. B. HOLLETT, MONROE, FRUIT AND VEGETABLE DEALER, TOWANDA, PA. FRANCIS E. POST, PAINTER, TOWANDA, PA. JOHN DUNFEE, BLACKSMITH, TOWANDA, PA. DR. DIMICK, D. SMITH, Surgeon, TOWANDA, PA. GREENWOOD COTTAGE, This is a new house, having recently been built and supplied with new furniture, will be found a pleasant place for a summer residence. WARD HOUSE, TOWANDA, PA. TEMPERANCE HOTEL, Situated on the northeast corner of Main and Elm Streets, TOWANDA, PA. DINING ROOMS, IN CONNECTION WITH THE BAKERY, TOWANDA, PA. ELWELL HOUSE, TOWANDA, PA. PUMPERNICK CREEK HOTEL, TOWANDA, PA. MEANS HOUSE, TOWANDA, PA. A LARGE ASSORTMENT OF FINE STOCK OF CHROMOS, TOWANDA, PA. THE BEST SYRUPS IN TOWN, TOWANDA, PA. FLOUR, FEED AND MEAL, TOWANDA, PA.

THE HUNTER'S CRIME. In the autumn of 1816, while the woods were bright in the variegated tints of the light foliage, a mounted traveler was quietly pursuing his way through a dark, lonely forest in the western part of the State of New York. He had ridden three miles since he had left the village of T. and had yet two miles to go before he could get sight of another. He was descending a hill into a gloomy valley, through which flowed a shallow but swift-running stream, and on reaching the bottom he perceived his thirsty horse to drink. At that moment a man stepped out from a cluster of bushes into a road, or horse-path, on the other side of the stream. This man was dressed in the most ordinary manner, and had a bundle slung over his shoulder. In his general appearance there was nothing to indicate hostility or wicked design. He was of medium size, compactly built, with intelligent features, and a general air of respectability. He came abroad from some settlement for a day's sport, than a professional hunter. All this the mounted traveler carefully noticed before he crossed the stream to continue his journey, and when they came together pleasant salutations were exchanged. "Fine weather for traveling, sir," remarked the man with the gun. "A fine hunting day, I suppose," smiled the man on the horse. "Yes, there is game enough," returned the other, "but I am not a good hunter, and can only show one bear for my day's work so far, and that is almost useless to me, for I would willingly give a dollar for the use of a horse like yours for a couple of hours. If you can spare five minutes or so, I would like you to see the best bear I have just beyond these bushes, one two or three hundred yards from here. "I will not only look at it," said the traveler, dismounting and fastening the horse, "but if not too heavy I will take along for you, as I am going the same way." The hunter thanked him in a most cordial manner, and then, as if to make himself agreeable, and keep up conversation, inquired where the other was from, and learned in reply that he was from Albany, and was a merchant in good business, and was traveling partly for his health, and partly with a view of making an extensive purchase of land. "Well, here we are," exclaimed the hunter, and the two emerged from a dense thicket, through which they had slowly forced their way; into an open road; "here we are, and I'll show you as fat a bear as you ever saw. Observe where I point my rifle." He stepped back eight or ten feet, deliberately raised his gun to his eye, and pointed the muzzle at the head of the traveler. There was a flash, a loud report, and the victim fell like a log. The hunter covered the body with his rifle, and then stepped forward to the first crime committed by the man with the rifle, but as the traveler fell the rifle slipped from his hand, and he fell on his side and buried himself in the bushes. He had a pocket-book, a gold watch and chain, some curious seals and a diamond ring which he fairly tore from his finger. Then he dragged the body into the thicket, plunged his hands through the bushes into the road, mounted the traveler's horse and dashed away from the awful scene. "We must now suppose a lapse of twenty years. In the spring of 1837 there lived in the city of New York a banker and a millionaire, whose name shall call Stephen Edwards. He owned a palatial mansion, splendidly furnished, in the very heart of the city, and he was one of the leading of the fashionable world. He had a daughter just turned out of sixteen, who was about to be married to a foreign nobleman, and great preparations were being made for the happy occasion. One day about this period, as the great banker stood conversing with a gentleman from another city, who had called to see him on business, he observed that the latter turned deadly pale and began to tremble. "My dear sir," said he, in his usual tone of off-hand sympathy, "what is the matter, are you ill?" "A little faint, sir, but nothing to cause any alarm," replied the other, hurriedly, "I am merely tired. If you will be kind enough to excuse me for ten minutes or so, I will take a short walk and return better." In ten minutes he did return; he was quite well, calm, collected, and then respectfully took his leave. It was perhaps a week after that one night the banker was sitting by the fire in the library, when the servant came in with a letter, which with a yawn and in the most indolent and indifferent manner possible, but had not read a dozen words before he came up with a start, turned deadly pale, and trembled all over. He read the note—it was rather a note than a letter, written one hand nervously at his throat, and with the other clasped his forehead and temples. For a minute or two he seemed to be choking in his own throat, and he so far succeeded in addressing the servant in an ordinary tone. "Thank you," he said, "who gave you this letter?" "A man, sir, and he said he'd wait an answer." "Then I suppose he is waiting." "Yes, sir." "Well, show him in." "Soon there was a tap at the door, and the banker said "come in," in an ordinary tone. The servant opened the door, ushered in the stranger, and immediately took up a chair for him. The man verging on sixty, of rough appearance and attire, he wore an old grey overcoat, buttoned to the throat, and a pair of green goggles, and his whole dress was saturated with rain. "Take a seat," said the banker, pointing to a chair. "No, thank you, I'll stand," was the gruff reply. "You got my letter, and of course, you know my business." "You allude to this, I suppose," replied the banker, producing the letter which had caused him so much perturbation. "Yes." "I do not understand it; you must have made a mistake." "No, no mistake at all; I was present, twenty years ago the tenth day of October, and saw you shoot the man; and if you go and deny it, I'll have you arrested for perjury. I've had my plans, and if you go playing innocent, and refuse my terms, I'll take care to see that you die stretching lamp." The banker turned pale in spite of himself, and uttered a faint cry. "I can't give it—it would ruin me." "Just as you say," rejoined the other, moving toward the door, "you know what will follow if I go this way." He argued, urged and implored far more at less fearful cost. In vain. At last the banker—seeing ruin, disgrace, death before him if he refused to agree to terms. He agreed to meet the stranger, with the request to do so on the following night, in front of St. Paul's Church. Both were punctual to the fixed time, and bills and checks to the amount of one hundred thousand dollars changed hands. A month later the banker, who had done run on the bank of which Stephen Edwards was the principal owner. It was soon closed. The sheriff was set to work by eager creditors, and all the real and personal property of the late millionaire were seized and sold, leaving him a beggar, and just claims unsatisfied. Fashionable friends deserted the family, and the proud nobleman refused the hand of the accomplished daughter. He was reduced to a state of extreme poverty and tribulation he encountered the man who had turned pale, and became so agitated in his presence a short time before. "I rather think you do not know me, sir," said the gentleman, with a formal bow. "Your face seems somewhat familiar, but I can't name you," returned Stephen Edwards. "Permit me to bring myself to your recollection, as I wish you to know me. A little more than six weeks ago I was talking to you on business, when you observed that I turned pale and became agitated." "Ah, yes; I remember you now." "I did not tell you why I was thus affected. My eyes had been turned upon a curious seal, which had belonged to a merchant named Philip Sidney, who was shot in the western part of this State some twenty years ago. I know you to be the villain who committed the foul deed." "Merciful God!" exclaimed the banker, with a blanched face and quaking form.

of the traveler. There was a flash, a loud report, and the victim fell like a log. The hunter covered the body with his rifle, and then stepped forward to the first crime committed by the man with the rifle, but as the traveler fell the rifle slipped from his hand, and he fell on his side and buried himself in the bushes. He had a pocket-book, a gold watch and chain, some curious seals and a diamond ring which he fairly tore from his finger. Then he dragged the body into the thicket, plunged his hands through the bushes into the road, mounted the traveler's horse and dashed away from the awful scene. "We must now suppose a lapse of twenty years. In the spring of 1837 there lived in the city of New York a banker and a millionaire, whose name shall call Stephen Edwards. He owned a palatial mansion, splendidly furnished, in the very heart of the city, and he was one of the leading of the fashionable world. He had a daughter just turned out of sixteen, who was about to be married to a foreign nobleman, and great preparations were being made for the happy occasion. One day about this period, as the great banker stood conversing with a gentleman from another city, who had called to see him on business, he observed that the latter turned deadly pale and began to tremble. "My dear sir," said he, in his usual tone of off-hand sympathy, "what is the matter, are you ill?" "A little faint, sir, but nothing to cause any alarm," replied the other, hurriedly, "I am merely tired. If you will be kind enough to excuse me for ten minutes or so, I will take a short walk and return better." In ten minutes he did return; he was quite well, calm, collected, and then respectfully took his leave. It was perhaps a week after that one night the banker was sitting by the fire in the library, when the servant came in with a letter, which with a yawn and in the most indolent and indifferent manner possible, but had not read a dozen words before he came up with a start, turned deadly pale, and trembled all over. He read the note—it was rather a note than a letter, written one hand nervously at his throat, and with the other clasped his forehead and temples. For a minute or two he seemed to be choking in his own throat, and he so far succeeded in addressing the servant in an ordinary tone. "Thank you," he said, "who gave you this letter?" "A man, sir, and he said he'd wait an answer." "Then I suppose he is waiting." "Yes, sir." "Well, show him in." "Soon there was a tap at the door, and the banker said "come in," in an ordinary tone. The servant opened the door, ushered in the stranger, and immediately took up a chair for him. The man verging on sixty, of rough appearance and attire, he wore an old grey overcoat, buttoned to the throat, and a pair of green goggles, and his whole dress was saturated with rain. "Take a seat," said the banker, pointing to a chair. "No, thank you, I'll stand," was the gruff reply. "You got my letter, and of course, you know my business." "You allude to this, I suppose," replied the banker, producing the letter which had caused him so much perturbation. "Yes." "I do not understand it; you must have made a mistake." "No, no mistake at all; I was present, twenty years ago the tenth day of October, and saw you shoot the man; and if you go and deny it, I'll have you arrested for perjury. I've had my plans, and if you go playing innocent, and refuse my terms, I'll take care to see that you die stretching lamp." The banker turned pale in spite of himself, and uttered a faint cry. "I can't give it—it would ruin me." "Just as you say," rejoined the other, moving toward the door, "you know what will follow if I go this way." He argued, urged and implored far more at less fearful cost. In vain. At last the banker—seeing ruin, disgrace, death before him if he refused to agree to terms. He agreed to meet the stranger, with the request to do so on the following night, in front of St. Paul's Church. Both were punctual to the fixed time, and bills and checks to the amount of one hundred thousand dollars changed hands. A month later the banker, who had done run on the bank of which Stephen Edwards was the principal owner. It was soon closed. The sheriff was set to work by eager creditors, and all the real and personal property of the late millionaire were seized and sold, leaving him a beggar, and just claims unsatisfied. Fashionable friends deserted the family, and the proud nobleman refused the hand of the accomplished daughter. He was reduced to a state of extreme poverty and tribulation he encountered the man who had turned pale, and became so agitated in his presence a short time before. "I rather think you do not know me, sir," said the gentleman, with a formal bow. "Your face seems somewhat familiar, but I can't name you," returned Stephen Edwards. "Permit me to bring myself to your recollection, as I wish you to know me. A little more than six weeks ago I was talking to you on business, when you observed that I turned pale and became agitated." "Ah, yes; I remember you now." "I did not tell you why I was thus affected. My eyes had been turned upon a curious seal, which had belonged to a merchant named Philip Sidney, who was shot in the western part of this State some twenty years ago. I know you to be the villain who committed the foul deed." "Merciful God!" exclaimed the banker, with a blanched face and quaking form.

of the traveler. There was a flash, a loud report, and the victim fell like a log. The hunter covered the body with his rifle, and then stepped forward to the first crime committed by the man with the rifle, but as the traveler fell the rifle slipped from his hand, and he fell on his side and buried himself in the bushes. He had a pocket-book, a gold watch and chain, some curious seals and a diamond ring which he fairly tore from his finger. Then he dragged the body into the thicket, plunged his hands through the bushes into the road, mounted the traveler's horse and dashed away from the awful scene. "We must now suppose a lapse of twenty years. In the spring of 1837 there lived in the city of New York a banker and a millionaire, whose name shall call Stephen Edwards. He owned a palatial mansion, splendidly furnished, in the very heart of the city, and he was one of the leading of the fashionable world. He had a daughter just turned out of sixteen, who was about to be married to a foreign nobleman, and great preparations were being made for the happy occasion. One day about this period, as the great banker stood conversing with a gentleman from another city, who had called to see him on business, he observed that the latter turned deadly pale and began to tremble. "My dear sir," said he, in his usual tone of off-hand sympathy, "what is the matter, are you ill?" "A little faint, sir, but nothing to cause any alarm," replied the other, hurriedly, "I am merely tired. If you will be kind enough to excuse me for ten minutes or so, I will take a short walk and return better." In ten minutes he did return; he was quite well, calm, collected, and then respectfully took his leave. It was perhaps a week after that one night the banker was sitting by the fire in the library, when the servant came in with a letter, which with a yawn and in the most indolent and indifferent manner possible, but had not read a dozen words before he came up with a start, turned deadly pale, and trembled all over. He read the note—it was rather a note than a letter, written one hand nervously at his throat, and with the other clasped his forehead and temples. For a minute or two he seemed to be choking in his own throat, and he so far succeeded in addressing the servant in an ordinary tone. "Thank you," he said, "who gave you this letter?" "A man, sir, and he said he'd wait an answer." "Then I suppose he is waiting." "Yes, sir." "Well, show him in." "Soon there was a tap at the door, and the banker said "come in," in an ordinary tone. The servant opened the door, ushered in the stranger, and immediately took up a chair for him. The man verging on sixty, of rough appearance and attire, he wore an old grey overcoat, buttoned to the throat, and a pair of green goggles, and his whole dress was saturated with rain. "Take a seat," said the banker, pointing to a chair. "No, thank you, I'll stand," was the gruff reply. "You got my letter, and of course, you know my business." "You allude to this, I suppose," replied the banker, producing the letter which had caused him so much perturbation. "Yes." "I do not understand it; you must have made a mistake." "No, no mistake at all; I was present, twenty years ago the tenth day of October, and saw you shoot the man; and if you go and deny it, I'll have you arrested for perjury. I've had my plans, and if you go playing innocent, and refuse my terms, I'll take care to see that you die stretching lamp." The banker turned pale in spite of himself, and uttered a faint cry. "I can't give it—it would ruin me." "Just as you say," rejoined the other, moving toward the door, "you know what will follow if I go this way." He argued, urged and implored far more at less fearful cost. In vain. At last the banker—seeing ruin, disgrace, death before him if he refused to agree to terms. He agreed to meet the stranger, with the request to do so on the following night, in front of St. Paul's Church. Both were punctual to the fixed time, and bills and checks to the amount of one hundred thousand dollars changed hands. A month later the banker, who had done run on the bank of which Stephen Edwards was the principal owner. It was soon closed. The sheriff was set to work by eager creditors, and all the real and personal property of the late millionaire were seized and sold, leaving him a beggar, and just claims unsatisfied. Fashionable friends deserted the family, and the proud nobleman refused the hand of the accomplished daughter. He was reduced to a state of extreme poverty and tribulation he encountered the man who had turned pale, and became so agitated in his presence a short time before. "I rather think you do not know me, sir," said the gentleman, with a formal bow. "Your face seems somewhat familiar, but I can't name you," returned Stephen Edwards. "Permit me to bring myself to your recollection, as I wish you to know me. A little more than six weeks ago I was talking to you on business, when you observed that I turned pale and became agitated." "Ah, yes; I remember you now." "I did not tell you why I was thus affected. My eyes had been turned upon a curious seal, which had belonged to a merchant named Philip Sidney, who was shot in the western part of this State some twenty years ago. I know you to be the villain who committed the foul deed." "Merciful God!" exclaimed the banker, with a blanched face and quaking form.

INSURANCE AGENCY. PRICE LIST—CASCADE MILLS. TO THE LADIES AND CHILDREN OF ATTENDANCE. NEW DYEING ESTABLISHMENT. BLACKSMITHING. MYERSBURG MILLS. THE UNDERGROUND HAVE BEEN REPAIRED.

NEW FIRM. NEW GOODS AND LOW PRICES! TRACY & HOLLON. CHEAP PASSAGE FROM OR TO IRELAND OR ENGLAND. NEW PLANING MILL! MACHINES, REPAIRING, MOULDINGS, ETC.

CANNED FRUITS OF ALL KINDS. A LARGE ASSORTMENT OF FINE STOCK OF CHROMOS. THE BEST SYRUPS IN TOWN. FLOUR, FEED AND MEAL.

THE HUNTER'S CRIME. In the autumn of 1816, while the woods were bright in the variegated tints of the light foliage, a mounted traveler was quietly pursuing his way through a dark, lonely forest in the western part of the State of New York. He had ridden three miles since he had left the village of T. and had yet two miles to go before he could get sight of another. He was descending a hill into a gloomy valley, through which flowed a shallow but swift-running stream, and on reaching the bottom he perceived his thirsty horse to drink. At that moment a man stepped out from a cluster of bushes into a road, or horse-path, on the other side of the stream. This man was dressed in the most ordinary manner, and had a bundle slung over his shoulder. In his general appearance there was nothing to indicate hostility or wicked design. He was of medium size, compactly built, with intelligent features, and a general air of respectability. He came abroad from some settlement for a day's sport, than a professional hunter. All this the mounted traveler carefully noticed before he crossed the stream to continue his journey, and when they came together pleasant salutations were exchanged. "Fine weather for traveling, sir," remarked the man with the gun. "A fine hunting day, I suppose," smiled the man on the horse. "Yes, there is game enough," returned the other, "but I am not a good hunter, and can only show one bear for my day's work so far, and that is almost useless to me, for I would willingly give a dollar for the use of a horse like yours for a couple of hours. If you can spare five minutes or so, I would like you to see the best bear I have just beyond these bushes, one two or three hundred yards from here. "I will not only look at it," said the traveler, dismounting and fastening the horse, "but if not too heavy I will take along for you, as I am going the same way." The hunter thanked him in a most cordial manner, and then, as if to make himself agreeable, and keep up conversation, inquired where the other was from, and learned in reply that he was from Albany, and was a merchant in good business, and was traveling partly for his health, and partly with a view of making an extensive purchase of land. "Well, here we are," exclaimed the hunter, and the two emerged from a dense thicket, through which they had slowly forced their way; into an open road; "here we are, and I'll show you as fat a bear as you ever saw. Observe where I point my rifle." He stepped back eight or ten feet, deliberately raised his gun to his eye, and pointed the muzzle at the head of the traveler. There was a flash, a loud report, and the victim fell like a log. The hunter covered the body with his rifle, and then stepped forward to the first crime committed by the man with the rifle, but as the traveler fell the rifle slipped from his hand, and he fell on his side and buried himself in the bushes. He had a pocket-book, a gold watch and chain, some curious seals and a diamond ring which he fairly tore from his finger. Then he dragged the body into the thicket, plunged his hands through the bushes into the road, mounted the traveler's horse and dashed away from the awful scene. "We must now suppose a lapse of twenty years. In the spring of 1837 there lived in the city of New York a banker and a millionaire, whose name shall call Stephen Edwards. He owned a palatial mansion, splendidly furnished, in the very heart of the city, and he was one of the leading of the fashionable world. He had a daughter just turned out of sixteen, who was about to be married to a foreign nobleman, and great preparations were being made for the happy occasion. One day about this period, as the great banker stood conversing with a gentleman from another city, who had called to see him on business, he observed that the latter turned deadly pale and began to tremble. "My dear sir," said he, in his usual tone of off-hand sympathy, "what is the matter, are you ill?" "A little faint, sir, but nothing to cause any alarm," replied the other, hurriedly, "I am merely tired. If you will be kind enough to excuse me for ten minutes or so, I will take a short walk and return better." In ten minutes he did return; he was quite well, calm, collected, and then respectfully took his leave. It was perhaps a week after that one night the banker was sitting by the fire in the library, when the servant came in with a letter, which with a yawn and in the most indolent and indifferent manner possible, but had not read a dozen words before he came up with a start, turned deadly pale, and trembled all over. He read the note—it was rather a note than a letter, written one hand nervously at his throat, and with the other clasped his forehead and temples. For a minute or two he seemed to be choking in his own throat, and he so far succeeded in addressing the servant in an ordinary tone. "Thank you," he said, "who gave you this letter?" "A man, sir, and he said he'd wait an answer." "Then I suppose he is waiting." "Yes, sir." "Well, show him in." "Soon there was a tap at the door, and the banker said "come in," in an ordinary tone. The servant opened the door, ushered in the stranger, and immediately took up a chair for him. The man verging on sixty, of rough appearance and attire, he wore an old grey overcoat, buttoned to the throat, and a pair of green goggles, and his whole dress was saturated with rain. "Take a seat," said the banker, pointing to a chair. "No, thank you, I'll stand," was the gruff reply. "You got my letter, and of course, you know my business." "You allude to this, I suppose," replied the banker, producing the letter which had caused him so much perturbation. "Yes." "I do not understand it; you must have made a mistake." "No, no mistake at all; I was present, twenty years ago the tenth day of October, and saw you shoot the man; and if you go and deny it, I'll have you arrested for perjury. I've had my plans, and if you go playing innocent, and refuse my terms, I'll take care to see that you die stretching lamp." The banker turned pale in spite of himself, and uttered a faint cry. "I can't give it—it would ruin me." "Just as you say," rejoined the other, moving toward the door, "you know what will follow if I go this way." He argued, urged and implored far more at less fearful cost. In vain. At last the banker—seeing ruin, disgrace, death before him if he refused to agree to terms. He agreed to meet the stranger, with the request to do so on the following night, in front of St. Paul's Church. Both were punctual to the fixed time, and bills and checks to the amount of one hundred thousand dollars changed hands. A month later the banker, who had done run on the bank of which Stephen Edwards was the principal owner. It was soon closed. The sheriff was set to work by eager creditors, and all the real and personal property of the late millionaire were seized and sold, leaving him a beggar, and just claims unsatisfied. Fashionable friends deserted the family, and the proud nobleman refused the hand of the accomplished daughter. He was reduced to a state of extreme poverty and tribulation he encountered the man who had turned pale, and became so agitated in his presence a short time before. "I rather think you do not know me, sir," said the gentleman, with a formal bow. "Your face seems somewhat familiar, but I can't name you," returned Stephen Edwards. "Permit me to bring myself to your recollection, as I wish you to know me. A little more than six weeks ago I was talking to you on business, when you observed that I turned pale and became agitated." "Ah, yes; I remember you now." "I did not tell you why I was thus affected. My eyes had been turned upon a curious seal, which had belonged to a merchant named Philip Sidney, who was shot in the western part of this State some twenty years ago. I know you to be the villain who committed the foul deed." "Merciful God!" exclaimed the banker, with a blanched face and quaking form.

of the traveler. There was a flash, a loud report, and the victim fell like a log. The hunter covered the body with his rifle, and then stepped forward to the first crime committed by the man with the rifle, but as the traveler fell the rifle slipped from his hand, and he fell on his side and buried himself in the bushes. He had a pocket-book, a gold watch and chain, some curious seals and a diamond ring which he fairly tore from his finger. Then he dragged the body into the thicket, plunged his hands through the bushes into the road, mounted the traveler's horse and dashed away from the awful scene. "We must now suppose a lapse of twenty years. In the spring of 1837 there lived in the city of New York a banker and a millionaire, whose name shall call Stephen Edwards. He owned a palatial mansion, splendidly furnished, in the very heart of the city, and he was one of the leading of the fashionable world. He had a daughter just turned out of sixteen, who was about to be married to a foreign nobleman, and great preparations were being made for the happy occasion. One day about this period, as the great banker stood conversing with a gentleman from another city, who had called to see him on business, he observed that the latter turned deadly pale and began to tremble. "My dear sir," said he, in his usual tone of off-hand sympathy, "what is the matter, are you ill?" "A little faint, sir, but nothing to cause any alarm," replied the other, hurriedly, "I am merely tired. If you will be kind enough to excuse me for ten minutes or so, I will take a short walk and return better." In ten minutes he did return; he was quite well, calm, collected, and then respectfully took his leave. It was perhaps a week after that one night the banker was sitting by the fire in the library, when the servant came in with a letter, which with a yawn and in the most indolent and indifferent manner possible, but had not read a dozen words before he came up with a start, turned deadly pale, and trembled all over. He read the note—it was rather a note than a letter, written one hand nervously at his throat, and with the other clasped his forehead and temples. For a minute or two he seemed to be choking in his own throat, and he so far succeeded in addressing the servant in an ordinary tone. "Thank you," he said, "who gave you this letter?" "A man, sir, and he said he'd wait an answer." "Then I suppose he is waiting." "Yes, sir." "Well, show him in." "Soon there was a tap at the door, and the banker said "come in," in an ordinary tone. The servant opened the door, ushered in the stranger, and immediately took up a chair for him. The man verging on sixty, of rough appearance and attire, he wore an old grey overcoat, buttoned to the throat, and a pair of green goggles, and his whole dress was saturated with rain. "Take a seat," said the banker, pointing to a chair. "No, thank you, I'll stand," was the gruff reply. "You got my letter, and of course, you know my business." "You allude to this, I suppose," replied the banker, producing the letter which had caused him so much perturbation. "Yes." "I do not understand it; you must have made a mistake." "No, no mistake at all; I was present, twenty years ago the tenth day of October, and saw you shoot the man; and if you go and deny it, I'll have you arrested for perjury. I've had my plans, and if you go playing innocent, and refuse my terms, I'll take care to see that you die stretching lamp." The banker turned pale in spite of himself, and uttered a faint cry. "I can't give it—it would ruin me." "Just as you say," rejoined the other, moving toward the door, "you know what will follow if I go this way." He argued, urged and implored far more at less fearful cost. In vain. At last the banker—seeing ruin, disgrace, death before him if he refused to agree to terms. He agreed to meet the stranger, with the request to do so on the following night, in front of St. Paul's Church. Both were punctual to the fixed time, and bills and checks to the amount of one hundred thousand dollars changed hands. A month later the banker, who had done run on the bank of which Stephen Edwards was the principal owner. It was soon closed. The sheriff was set to work by eager creditors, and all the real and personal property of the late millionaire were seized and sold, leaving him a beggar, and just claims unsatisfied. Fashionable friends deserted the family, and the proud nobleman refused the hand of the accomplished daughter. He was reduced to a state of extreme poverty and tribulation he encountered the man who had turned pale, and became so agitated in his presence a short time before. "I rather think you do not know me, sir," said the gentleman, with a formal bow. "Your face seems somewhat familiar, but I can't name you," returned Stephen Edwards. "Permit me to bring myself to your recollection, as I wish you to know me. A little more than six weeks ago I was talking to you on business, when you observed that I turned pale and became agitated." "Ah, yes; I remember you now." "I did not tell you why I was thus affected. My eyes had been turned upon a curious seal, which had belonged to a merchant named Philip Sidney, who was shot in the western part of this State some twenty years ago. I know you to be the villain who committed the foul deed." "Merciful God!" exclaimed the banker, with a blanched face and quaking form.

of the traveler. There was a flash, a loud report, and the victim fell like a log. The hunter covered the body with his rifle, and then stepped forward to the first crime committed by the man with the rifle, but as the traveler fell the rifle slipped from his hand, and he fell on his side and buried himself in the bushes. He had a pocket-book, a gold watch and chain, some curious seals and a diamond ring which he fairly tore from his finger. Then he dragged the body into the thicket, plunged his hands through the bushes into the road, mounted the traveler's horse and dashed away from the awful scene. "We must now suppose a lapse of twenty years. In the spring of 1837 there lived in the city of New York a banker and a millionaire, whose name shall call Stephen Edwards. He owned a palatial mansion, splendidly furnished, in the very heart of the city, and he was one of the leading of the fashionable world. He had a daughter just turned out of sixteen, who was about to be married to a foreign nobleman, and great preparations were being made for the happy occasion. One day about this period, as the great banker stood conversing with a gentleman from another city, who had called to see him on business, he observed that the latter turned deadly pale and began to tremble. "My dear sir," said he, in his usual tone of off-hand sympathy, "what is the matter, are you ill?" "A little faint, sir, but nothing to cause any alarm," replied the other, hurriedly, "I am merely tired. If you will be kind enough to excuse me for ten minutes or so, I will take a short walk and return better." In ten minutes he did return; he was quite well, calm, collected, and then respectfully took his leave. It was perhaps a week after that one night the banker was sitting by the fire in the library, when the servant came in with a letter, which with a yawn and in the most indolent and indifferent manner possible, but had not read a dozen words before he came up with a start, turned deadly pale, and trembled all over. He read the note—it was rather a note than a letter, written one hand nervously at his throat, and with the other clasped his forehead and temples. For a minute or two he seemed to be choking in his own throat, and he so far succeeded in addressing the servant in an ordinary tone. "Thank you," he said, "who gave you this letter?" "A man, sir, and he said he'd wait an answer." "Then I suppose he is waiting." "Yes, sir." "Well, show him in." "Soon there was a tap at the door, and the banker said "come in," in an ordinary tone. The servant opened the door, ushered in the stranger, and immediately took up a chair for him. The man verging on sixty, of rough appearance and attire, he wore an old grey overcoat, buttoned to the throat, and a pair of green goggles, and his whole dress was saturated with rain. "Take a seat," said the banker, pointing to a chair. "No, thank you, I'll stand," was the gruff reply. "You got my letter, and of course, you know my business." "You allude to this, I suppose," replied the banker, producing the letter which had caused him so much perturbation. "Yes." "I do not understand it; you must have made a mistake." "No, no mistake at all; I was present, twenty years ago the tenth day of October, and saw you shoot the man; and if you go and deny it, I'll have you arrested for perjury. I've had my plans, and if you go playing innocent, and refuse my terms, I'll take care to see that you die stretching lamp." The banker turned pale in spite of himself, and uttered a faint cry. "I can't give it—it would ruin me." "Just as you say," rejoined the other, moving toward the door, "you know what will follow if I go this way." He argued, urged and implored far more at less fearful cost. In vain. At last the banker—seeing ruin, disgrace, death before him if he refused to agree to terms. He agreed to meet the stranger, with the request to do so on the following night, in front of St. Paul's Church. Both were punctual to the fixed time, and bills and checks to the amount of one hundred thousand dollars changed hands. A month later the banker, who had done run on the bank of which Stephen Edwards was the principal owner. It was soon closed. The sheriff was set to work by eager creditors, and all the real and personal property of the late millionaire were seized and sold, leaving him a beggar, and just claims unsatisfied. Fashionable friends deserted the family, and the proud nobleman refused the hand of the accomplished daughter. He was reduced to a state of extreme poverty and tribulation he encountered the man who had turned pale, and became so agitated in his presence a short time before. "I rather think you do not know me, sir," said the gentleman, with a formal bow. "Your face seems somewhat familiar, but I can't name you," returned Stephen Edwards. "Permit me to bring myself to your recollection, as I wish you to know me. A little more than six weeks ago I was talking to you on business, when you observed that I turned pale and became agitated." "Ah, yes; I remember you now." "I did not tell you why I was thus affected. My eyes had been turned upon a curious seal, which had belonged to a merchant named Philip Sidney, who was shot in the western part of this State some twenty years ago. I know you to be the villain who committed the foul deed." "Merciful God!" exclaimed the banker, with a blanched face and quaking form.

of the traveler. There was a flash, a loud report, and the victim fell like a log. The hunter covered the body with his rifle, and then stepped forward to the first crime committed by the man with the rifle, but as the traveler fell the rifle slipped from his hand, and he fell on his side and buried himself in the bushes. He had a pocket-book, a gold watch and chain, some curious seals and a diamond ring which he fairly tore from his finger. Then he dragged the body into the thicket, plunged his hands through the bushes into the road, mounted the traveler's horse and dashed away from the awful scene. "We must now suppose a lapse of twenty years. In the spring of 1837 there lived in the city of New York a banker and a millionaire, whose name shall call Stephen Edwards. He owned a palatial mansion, splendidly furnished, in the very heart of the city, and he was one of the leading of the fashionable world. He had a daughter just turned out of sixteen, who was about to be married to a foreign nobleman, and great preparations were being made for the happy occasion. One day about this period, as the great banker stood conversing with a gentleman from another city, who had called to see him on business, he observed that the latter turned deadly pale and began to tremble. "My dear sir," said he, in his usual tone of off-hand sympathy, "what is the matter, are you ill?" "A little faint, sir, but nothing to cause any alarm," replied the other, hurriedly, "I am merely tired. If you will be kind enough to excuse me for ten minutes or so, I will take a short walk and return better." In ten minutes he did return; he was quite well, calm, collected, and then respectfully took his leave. It was perhaps a week after that one night the banker was sitting by the fire in the library, when the servant came in with a letter, which with a yawn and in the most indolent and indifferent manner possible, but had not read a dozen words before he came up with a start, turned deadly pale, and trembled all over. He read the note—it was rather a note than a letter, written one hand nervously at his throat, and with the other clasped his forehead and temples. For a minute or two he seemed to be choking in his own throat, and he so far succeeded in addressing the servant in an ordinary tone. "Thank you," he said, "who gave you this letter?" "A man, sir, and he said he'd wait an answer." "Then I suppose he is waiting." "Yes, sir." "Well, show him in." "Soon there was a tap at the door, and the banker said "come in," in an ordinary tone. The servant opened the door, ushered in the stranger, and immediately took up a chair for him. The man verging on sixty, of rough appearance and attire, he wore an old grey overcoat, buttoned to the throat, and a pair of green goggles, and his whole dress was saturated with rain. "Take a seat," said the banker, pointing to a chair. "No, thank you, I'll stand," was the gruff reply. "You got my letter, and of course, you know my business." "You allude to this, I suppose," replied the banker, producing the letter which had caused him so much perturbation. "Yes." "I do not understand it; you must have made a mistake." "No, no mistake at all; I was present, twenty years ago the tenth day of October, and saw you shoot the man; and if you go and deny it, I'll have you arrested for perjury. I've had my plans, and if you go playing innocent, and refuse my terms, I'll take care to see that you die stretching lamp." The banker turned pale in spite of himself, and uttered a faint cry. "I can't give it—it would ruin me." "Just as you say," rejoined the other, moving toward the door, "you know what will follow if I go this way." He argued, urged and implored far more at less fearful cost. In vain. At last the banker—seeing ruin, disgrace, death before him if he refused to agree to terms. He agreed to meet the stranger, with the request to do so on the following night, in front of St. Paul's Church. Both were punctual to the fixed time, and bills and checks to the amount of one hundred thousand dollars changed hands. A month later the banker, who had done run on the bank of which Stephen Edwards was the principal owner. It was soon closed. The sheriff was set to work by eager creditors, and all the real and personal property of the late millionaire were seized and sold, leaving him a beggar, and just claims unsatisfied. Fashionable friends deserted the family, and the proud nobleman refused the hand of the accomplished daughter. He was reduced to a state of extreme poverty and tribulation he encountered the man who had turned pale, and became so agitated in his presence a short time before. "I rather think you do not know me, sir," said the gentleman, with a formal bow. "Your face seems somewhat familiar, but I can't name you," returned Stephen Edwards. "Permit me to bring myself to your recollection, as I wish you to know me. A little more than six weeks ago I was talking to you on business, when you observed that I turned pale and became agitated." "Ah, yes; I remember you now." "I did not tell you why I was thus affected. My eyes had been turned upon a curious seal, which had belonged to a merchant named Philip Sidney, who was shot in the western part of this State some twenty years ago. I know you to be the villain who committed the foul deed." "Merciful God!" exclaimed the banker, with a blanched face and quaking form. of the traveler. There was a flash, a loud report, and the victim fell like a log. The hunter covered the body with his rifle, and then stepped forward to the first crime committed by the man with the rifle, but as the traveler fell the rifle slipped from his hand, and he fell on his side and buried himself in the bushes. He had a pocket-book, a gold watch and chain, some curious seals and a diamond ring which he fairly tore from his finger. Then he dragged the body into the thicket, plunged his hands through the bushes into the road, mounted the traveler's horse and dashed away from the awful scene. "We must now suppose a lapse of twenty years. In the spring of 1837 there lived in the city of New York a banker and a millionaire, whose name shall call Stephen Edwards. He owned a palatial mansion, splendidly furnished, in the very heart of the city, and he was one of the leading of the fashionable world. He had a daughter just turned out of sixteen, who was about to be married to a foreign nobleman, and great preparations were being made for the happy occasion. One day about this period, as the great banker stood conversing with a gentleman from another city, who had called to see him on business, he observed that the latter turned deadly pale and began to tremble. "My dear sir," said he, in his usual tone of off-hand sympathy, "what is the matter, are you ill?" "A little faint, sir, but nothing to cause any alarm," replied the other, hurriedly, "I am merely tired. If you will be kind enough to excuse me for ten minutes or so, I will take a short walk and return better." In ten minutes he did return; he was quite well, calm, collected, and then respectfully took his leave. It was perhaps a week after that one night the banker was sitting by the fire in the library, when the servant came in with a letter, which with a yawn and in the most indolent and indifferent manner possible, but had not read a dozen words before he came up with a start, turned deadly pale, and trembled all over. He read the note—it was rather a note than a letter, written one hand nervously at his throat, and with the other clasped his forehead and temples. For a minute or two he seemed to be choking in his own throat, and he so far succeeded in addressing the servant in an ordinary tone. "Thank you," he said, "who gave you this letter?" "A man, sir, and he said he'd wait an answer." "Then I suppose he is waiting." "Yes, sir." "Well, show him in." "Soon there was a tap at the door, and the banker said "come in," in an ordinary tone. The servant opened the door, ushered in the stranger, and immediately took up a chair for him. The man verging on sixty, of rough appearance and attire, he wore an old grey overcoat, buttoned to the throat, and a pair of green goggles, and his whole dress was saturated with rain. "Take a seat," said the banker, pointing to a chair. "No, thank you, I'll stand," was the gruff reply. "You got my letter, and of course, you know my business." "You allude to this, I suppose," replied the banker, producing the letter which had caused him so much perturbation. "Yes." "I do not understand it; you must have made a mistake." "No, no mistake at all; I was present, twenty years ago the tenth day of October, and saw you shoot the man; and if you go and deny it, I'll have you arrested for perjury. I've had my plans, and if you go playing innocent, and refuse my terms, I'll take care to see that you die stretching lamp."