The Religious Culture of the Freedmen is their profoundest need. The moral blight of slavery has done its fearful work upon them. They have pastors and churches, but too deplorably often, both have zeal without knowledge and faith without works. The association attempt no proselyting, but aims to prepare the people, by its Christian schools, to appreciate and demand an educated ministry and a pure church. As fast as possible it sends such ministers and organizes such churches.

A great part of the region is traversed by ranges of hills and moun-tains, some of the latter being the loftiest in the State. In this vast forest, portions of which have not yet been fully explored, deer and other species of wild animals abound. The surface is dotted with lakes, to the number of a thousand or more, which are among the most beautiful in America. In these are found the salmon, and the speekled or brook front, in great abundance. Furbearing animals, the otter, martin, mink and muskrat, also abound It is indeed a wilderness, almost the entire tract being in a state of nature, as it has stood since the deluge, except the marks left by hunters and fishermen, in the erection of their cabins, and by their foot paths around the rapids of the streams, where the current is too strong to be passed over by row-boats.
