A THOUGHT. Once upon my pillow lying While without the winds were sighing, And upon the window-pane Heard the patter of the rain; All without seemed dark and lonely, And the wind to me spoke only, Spoke in accents strange and weird, Accents that I almost feared.

Back upon my pillow falling. Heeding not the wind's wild calling Though it tried my soul to taunt With its wild and death-like chant, Sounding like a funéral dirge, Striving on my soul to urge Forms too hideous for human, Thoughts that only visit few men.

But my soul so tired and weary Heeded not the sounds so dreary, And my spirit took its flight To the distant realms of night. Night is sleep and day is waking, And in sleep the mind's oft taking Flights from out this mind, our sphere, To the strange unknown, so near.

Only for a moment's sleeping-In my face the sun came creeping, Bousing me from slumbers deep, Waking me from out my sleep-And upon the velvet lining Of my couch the sun was shining, Through the crystal drops of rain, Gathered on the window pane.

Never moving I lay pondering, Thinking, reasoning, wondering, Thinking of the hour of death, When my hody's latest breath Shall have ended, and my clay Waiting for the wondrous day, Besurrection's fearful morn, When we shall again be born.

And my spirit breathed a prayer, Upward through the sunlit air, Tha the light of heaven shining, All my soul and spirit filning, May with light my spirit wake, My mortal flesh to take, And my voice through heaven ringing, Sough of praise to Jeaus singing.

To be comprehensive and thorough, then, and working on the synthetic principle, we will go back to the general classification of languages. It is usually as follows: First, Chinese stock of languages. Second, Semitic stock. Third, Indo-European. Fourth. African. Fifth, American. Sixth. Oceanic or Polynesian.
