"In the death of James H. Welles, of New York city, on the 8th inst., Amherst college mourns the loss of a constant friend and frequent benefactor, and the community losses a business man of rare enterprise, integrity and public spirit. A graduate of Amherst in the class of 1843, when the institution was at its lowest point of poverty and depression, he has almost ever since been giving, not large sums but timely donations; now to the library and now to the cabinets; here an instrument of music for the chapel, and there a subscription to the museum of arts antiquities. And what he has done is only the beginning of what he wished and proposed to do for his Alma Mater, if his life had been spared. He died at the age of 53, prosperous, generous, having accomplished much and enjoyed much, but apparently just as he was entering the period of his greatest usefulness and happiness. Mr. Welles built large sections of some of the principal railroads in New York, Pennsylvania and Texas, and bore a prominent part in the construction allroads in New Yors, remnsystams and seas, and bore a prominent part in the construction of the ship-canal in the mining region of Lake Superior. But the best and most lasting memorial which he has left of himself, is in the grateful hearts of the poor and the suffering, the widow and the fatherless, whom he has re-lieved and made happy, and in the unfalling remembrance of Him who will say to such: "Inasmuch as ye did it unto one of the least of these, my brethren, ye did it unto me."
