EVIL OF INTERUPTION IN INTELECTUAL WORK.—Few people realize the full evil of an interruption, few people know all that is implied by it. Florence Nightingale says: "If we consider as with sick as with well, every thought decomposes some nervous matter, that to obtrude another thought upon the brain whilst it is in the act of destroying nervous matter by thinking, is calling on it to make a new exertion, we shall remember that we are doing positive injury by interrupting. If the invalid s forced by his avocations to continue occupations requiring much thinking, the injury is doubly great. If you offer the brain a thought, especially one requiring a decision, abruptly, you do it a real not fanciful injury. This rule applies to the well quite as much as to the sick. I have never known persons who exposed themselves for pain With the sick, pain gives is an evil to the reader which must be estimated very differently from ordinary business interruptions. were under the circumstances, at doubtless be a pretty lively contest. The great question about the interruption is not whether it compels you to divert your attention too ther facts, but whether it compels you to

> "AULD ROBIN GRAY." + Of the origin of this favorite song a pleasant story air (not, however, to which the song is now sung, for that we owe to an English clergyman of which Lady Anne Barnard was very fond, and which Soph Johnstone was in the habit of singing to words that were far from choice. It struck Lady Ann that she could supply the air with a tale of virtuous distress in human life with which all could sympathize. Robin Gray was the name of a shepherd at Balcarres, who house. He had once arrested them in their flight to an indulgent neigh bor's. Lady Ann revenged this arrest by seizing the old man's name, and preventing it from passing into forgetfulness. While she was in the act of heaping misfortunes on the heroine, Jennie, her sister Elizabeth, twelve or thirteen years her junior, strayed-into the little room and saw "Sister Anne" at her escritoire. "I have been writing a ballad, my dear, the frank elder sister told her little confident, "and I am oppressing my heroine with many misfortunes. I broke her father's arm, and made her mother fall sick, and gave her. Auld Elizabeth. The cow was immediately lifted, and the song completed.
