It is all explained now. For some weeks past, the friends of D. O. HOLLON have been sorely puzzled to account for his strange performances. He wandered about in a half-distracted, moody state, but his countenance was always illumined by the pleasantest smiles. An announce ment in this paper explains the whole matter. Cupid had wounded him, in fact had succeeded in so throwing a Net around him that he was unable to control himself. Now that he has done the only sensible thing to be done under such circumstances, we have no doubt that when he returns from "that trip West," he will be found clothed in his right mind. He has certainly found a prize in the es-timable young lady whom he led to the hymencal altar, and ought to be proud and happy over his conquest.
