

The Bradford Reporter.

S. W. ALVORD, Publisher.

REGARDLESS OF DEMUNCIATION FROM ANY QUARTER.

TOWANDA, BRADFORD COUNTY, PA., THURSDAY MORNING, MARCH 9, 1876.

82 per Annum in Advance.

NUMBER 38.

VOLUME XXXVI.

Evans & Hildreth.

CALL

ON

EVANS & HILDRETH.

AT

THEIR

NEW STORE,

ON

MAIN STREET,

AND

SECURE

SOME OF

THE

GREAT BARGAINS,

THEY OFFER

IN

PRINTS,

SHEETINGS,

SHIRTINGS,

CASSIMERES,

DRESS GOODS,

WHITE GOODS,

EMBROIDERIES,

LAACES,

NOTIONS,

&c., &c., &c., &c.

EVANS & HILDRETH

Taylor & Co

BEAUTIFUL

ASSORTMENT

OF

HOLIDAY GOODS,

AT

Taylor & Co's

THIS WEEK

Selected Poetry.

RECREATION.

The low cannot be always bent,
It springs from the low to the high;
The high cannot be always bent,
It springs from the high to the low.

Dem's Nature's laws must be obeyed,
And need not be obeyed;
If we would thrive and happy be,
We must strength and intellect have.

So let this rhyme, amiable man,
And hold your own and your hate,
Remember that it may not win,
Who first leads in the race!

The man who works his honest hour,
With cheerfulness and sweet content,
Will gain more wealth and happiness,
Than if he toiled his whole day long.

Then work with will in working time,
With muscle and with teaching hand,
And you will still be resting time,
The world will still be resting same.

THE THREE SONGS OF THE HUNCHBACK.

FROM THE FRENCH OF ALEXANDRE
DUMAS THE YOUNGER.

In a solitary chateau on the borders of the Rhine there once lived a young knight who had just returned from the wars and married his cousin Yselt.

The bride was beautiful and young,
The blent tint of the lily and the rose are not more lovely than was the delicate bloom of the girl's cheek.

The night no longer cared for the excitements of the combat; his only desire now was for the pleasures of home life. His sword was allowed to rust in its scabbard, and he thought about it no more; there were a few distaff. As for his armor, he sent it to the smith to be melted down.

After a time a baby son was given to the cavalier, and as you may well think, this arrival made no end of rejoicings in the old chateau, for the young couple were so fond of their little child that they could not be bound still closer the knight and the fair Yselt.

All the friends of the happy couple were now bidden to the castle, not forgetting a certain magician, who lived on the other bank of the river, and who had once upon a time been saved by the knight. He found the wise man with a letter about his neck, charged with having discovered a long hidden truth, and you know, my dear children, there is nothing more dangerous than to make and publish such a discovery.

Now there is no flout that this magician was a brave old fellow, who busied himself in trying to benefit humanity; he was very learned, old and very virtuous. He was in years but always young in feeling, and inspired the greatest confidence in all who came near him.

The magician went to the baptism and saw the child, who was called Herman. "My dear Theos," said the knight, "I am anxious that my son shall be happy, and as you know everything, you can tell me what I must do to secure this great good."

The magician replied: "Sir knight, you have many kinsmen who ought to be able to assist you in this matter; call them together this evening, and then together ask each other to wish something for your son; I will answer that all the wishes shall be fulfilled, but on one condition."

"That I may also form a wish for the child."

"It is no condition that you exact from me, replied the young father, but a very great honor that you confer.
I am sure that you only wish to make my boy both good and happy."

"This evening, then."

At the appointed hour Yselt appeared in the great saloon of reception. In the hall arms the baby, all molendine in white and silk stuffs, fast asleep. Then she lay it gently down in its cradle of gold and ivory, while the father invited the guests to look at his heir, and told them what the magician had engaged to do.

Immediately after Theos appeared.
Gentlemen, he said to the cavalier, who surrounded the cradle, "The happiness is very hard to find. We all love this little one, because we love its parents, and we must all wish for it the thing most likely to make it happy. I have the power to make your wishes certain. Speak, my friend, I am here, and I have the father, what do you wish for your son?"

"That he may be brave," replied the knight.

"A noble wish," said Theos, "and it is the first that should have been made; but the boy would have been brave in any event, for are you not his father, and have you not the name of being one of the bravest knights in Christendom?" The cavalier bowed.

"And you, Madam, what do you desire for your child?" asked Theos of Yselt.

"That she shall love me as I love him," replied the mother.

"He will love you, Madam, as soon as he is able to know you." (Here, my reader, you will observe that Theos was a very gallant magician.)

Then turning toward the other guests, he said to one of them,
"What do you wish for the son of our host?"

"That he may live as many years as I have lived," was the reply.

"And you?" he asked of another.

"That he may be always rich."

"And you?"

"That he may be always strong."

Still there were three more wishes; three wishes made by the young girls—cousins of the baby.

"May he have beautiful blonde hair," said the first. And eyes blue as sapphires, added the second. And teeth like pearls, wished the third.

"Sir knight," said Theos, "your son will have all that his kinsmen and kinswomen have desired for him."

Selected Poetry.

RECREATION.

The low cannot be always bent,
It springs from the low to the high;
The high cannot be always bent,
It springs from the high to the low.

Dem's Nature's laws must be obeyed,
And need not be obeyed;
If we would thrive and happy be,
We must strength and intellect have.

So let this rhyme, amiable man,
And hold your own and your hate,
Remember that it may not win,
Who first leads in the race!

The man who works his honest hour,
With cheerfulness and sweet content,
Will gain more wealth and happiness,
Than if he toiled his whole day long.

Then work with will in working time,
With muscle and with teaching hand,
And you will still be resting time,
The world will still be resting same.

THE THREE SONGS OF THE HUNCHBACK.

FROM THE FRENCH OF ALEXANDRE
DUMAS THE YOUNGER.

In a solitary chateau on the borders
of the Rhine there once lived a young knight who had just returned from the wars and married his cousin Yselt.

The bride was beautiful and young,
The blent tint of the lily and the
rose are not more lovely than was the delicate bloom of the girl's cheek.

The night no longer cared for the
excitements of the combat; his only desire now was for the pleasures of
home life. His sword was allowed to rust in its scabbard, and he thought about it no more; there were a few distaff. As for his armor, he sent it to the smith to be melted down.

After a time a baby son was given to the cavalier, and as you may
well think, this arrival made no end
of rejoicings in the old chateau, for
the young couple were so fond of their
little child that they could not be bound still closer the knight and the fair Yselt.

All the friends of the happy couple
were now bidden to the castle, not
forgetting a certain magician, who lived on the other bank of the river,
and who had once upon a time
been saved by the knight. He found the wise man with a letter about his neck, charged with having discovered
a long hidden truth, and you know, my dear children, there is nothing more dangerous than to make and
publish such a discovery.

Now there is no flout that this
magician was a brave old fellow,
who busied himself in trying to benefit humanity; he was very learned,
old and very virtuous. He was in years but always young in feeling,
and inspired the greatest confidence
in all who came near him.

The magician went to the baptism
and saw the child, who was called Herman. "My dear Theos," said the
knight, "I am anxious that my son
shall be happy, and as you know everything, you can tell me what I
must do to secure this great good."

The magician replied: "Sir knight,
you have many kinsmen who ought
to be able to assist you in this matter; call them together this evening,
and then together ask each other
to wish something for your son; I will answer that all the wishes shall
be fulfilled, but on one condition."

"That I may also form a wish for the child."

"It is no condition that you exact
from me, replied the young father,
but a very great honor that you confer.
I am sure that you only wish
to make my boy both good and happy."

"This evening, then."

At the appointed hour Yselt appeared in the great saloon of reception. In the hall arms the baby,
all molendine in white and silk stuffs,
fast asleep. Then she lay it gently
down in its cradle of gold and ivory,
while the father invited the guests to look at his heir, and told them what
the magician had engaged to do.

Immediately after Theos appeared.
Gentlemen, he said to the cavalier,
who surrounded the cradle, "The happiness is very hard to find. We all love this little one, because we love its parents, and we must all
wish for it the thing most likely to make it happy. I have the power to make your wishes certain. Speak, my friend, I am here, and I have the father, what do you wish for
your son?"

"That he may be brave," replied
the knight.

"A noble wish," said Theos, "and it is the first that should have been made; but the boy would have been brave in any event, for are you not
his father, and have you not the name of being one of the bravest
knights in Christendom?" The cavalier bowed.

"And you, Madam, what do you desire for your child?" asked Theos
of Yselt.

"That she shall love me as I love
him," replied the mother.

"He will love you, Madam, as soon as he is able to know you." (Here,
my reader, you will observe that Theos was a very gallant magician.)

Then turning toward the other
guests, he said to one of them,
"What do you wish for the son of our host?"

"That he may live as many years as I have lived," was the reply.

"And you?" he asked of another.

"That he may be always rich."

"And you?"

"That he may be always strong."

Still there were three more wishes;
three wishes made by the young girls—cousins of the baby.

"May he have beautiful blonde hair," said the first. And eyes blue as sapphires, added the second. And teeth like pearls, wished the third.

"Sir knight," said Theos, "your son
will have all that his kinsmen and
kinswomen have desired for him."

Selected Poetry.

RECREATION.

The low cannot be always bent,
It springs from the low to the high;
The high cannot be always bent,
It springs from the high to the low.

Dem's Nature's laws must be obeyed,
And need not be obeyed;
If we would thrive and happy be,
We must strength and intellect have.

So let this rhyme, amiable man,
And hold your own and your hate,
Remember that it may not win,
Who first leads in the race!

The man who works his honest hour,
With cheerfulness and sweet content,
Will gain more wealth and happiness,
Than if he toiled his whole day long.

Then work with will in working time,
With muscle and with teaching hand,
And you will still be resting time,
The world will still be resting same.

THE THREE SONGS OF THE HUNCHBACK.

FROM THE FRENCH OF ALEXANDRE
DUMAS THE YOUNGER.

In a solitary chateau on the borders
of the Rhine there once lived a young knight who had just returned from the wars and married his cousin Yselt.

The bride was beautiful and young,
The blent tint of the lily and the
rose are not more lovely than was the delicate bloom of the girl's cheek.

The night no longer cared for the
excitements of the combat; his only desire now was for the pleasures of
home life. His sword was allowed to rust in its scabbard, and he thought about it no more; there were a few distaff. As for his armor, he sent it to the smith to be melted down.

After a time a baby son was given to the cavalier, and as you may
well think, this arrival made no end
of rejoicings in the old chateau, for
the young couple were so fond of their
little child that they could not be bound still closer the knight and the fair Yselt.

All the friends of the happy couple
were now bidden to the castle, not
forgetting a certain magician, who lived on the other bank of the river,
and who had once upon a time
been saved by the knight. He found the wise man with a letter about his neck, charged with having discovered
a long hidden truth, and you know, my dear children, there is nothing more dangerous than to make and
publish such a discovery.

Now there is no flout that this
magician was a brave old fellow,
who busied himself in trying to benefit humanity; he was very learned,
old and very virtuous. He was in years but always young in feeling,
and inspired the greatest confidence
in all who came near him.

The magician went to the baptism
and saw the child, who was called Herman. "My dear Theos," said the
knight, "I am anxious that my son
shall be happy, and as you know everything, you can tell me what I
must do to secure this great good."

The magician replied: "Sir knight,
you have many kinsmen who ought
to be able to assist you in this matter; call them together this evening,
and then together ask each other
to wish something for your son; I will answer that all the wishes shall
be fulfilled, but on one condition."

"That I may also form a wish for the child."

"It is no condition that you exact
from me, replied the young father,
but a very great honor that you confer.
I am sure that you only wish
to make my boy both good and happy."

"This evening, then."

At the appointed hour Yselt appeared in the great saloon of reception. In the hall arms the baby,
all molendine in white and silk stuffs,
fast asleep. Then she lay it gently
down in its cradle of gold and ivory,
while the father invited the guests to look at his heir, and told them what
the magician had engaged to do.

Immediately after Theos appeared.
Gentlemen, he said to the cavalier,
who surrounded the cradle, "The happiness is very hard to find. We all love this little one, because we love its parents, and we must all
wish for it the thing most likely to make it happy. I have the power to make your wishes certain. Speak, my friend, I am here, and I have
the father, what do you wish for
your son?"

"That he may be brave," replied
the knight.

"A noble wish," said Theos, "and it is the first that should have been made; but the boy would have been brave in any event, for are you not
his father, and have you not the name of being one of the bravest
knights in Christendom?" The cavalier bowed.

"And you, Madam, what do you desire for your child?" asked Theos
of Yselt.

"That she shall love me as I love
him," replied the mother.

"He will love you, Madam, as soon as he is able to know you." (Here,
my reader, you will observe that Theos was a very gallant magician.)

Then turning toward the other
guests, he said to one of them,
"What do you wish for the son of our host?"

"That he may live as many years as I have lived," was the reply.

"And you?" he asked of another.

"That he may be always rich."

"And you?"

"That he may be always strong."

Still there were three more wishes;
three wishes made by the young girls—cousins of the baby.

"May he have beautiful blonde hair," said the first. And eyes blue as sapphires, added the second. And teeth like pearls, wished the third.

"Sir knight," said Theos, "your son
will have all that his kinsmen and
kinswomen have desired for him."

Selected Poetry.

RECREATION.

The low cannot be always bent,
It springs from the low to the high;
The high cannot be always bent,
It springs from the high to the low.

Dem's Nature's laws must be obeyed,
And need not be obeyed;
If we would thrive and happy be,
We must strength and intellect have.

So let this rhyme, amiable man,
And hold your own and your hate,
Remember that it may not win,
Who first leads in the race!

The man who works his honest hour,
With cheerfulness and sweet content,
Will gain more wealth and happiness,
Than if he toiled his whole day long.

Then work with will in working time,
With muscle and with teaching hand,
And you will still be resting time,
The world will still be resting same.

THE THREE SONGS OF THE HUNCHBACK.

FROM THE FRENCH OF ALEXANDRE
DUMAS THE YOUNGER.

In a solitary chateau on the borders
of the Rhine there once lived a young knight who had just returned from the wars and married his cousin Yselt.

The bride was beautiful and young,
The blent tint of the lily and the
rose are not more lovely than was the delicate bloom of the girl's cheek.

The night no longer cared for the
excitements of the combat; his only desire now was for the pleasures of
home life. His sword was allowed to rust in its scabbard, and he thought about it no more; there were a few distaff. As for his armor, he sent it to the smith to be melted down.

After a time a baby son was given to the cavalier, and as you may
well think, this arrival made no end
of rejoicings in the old chateau, for
the young couple were so fond of their
little child that they could not be bound still closer the knight and the fair Yselt.

All the friends of the happy couple
were now bidden to the castle, not
forgetting a certain magician, who lived on the other bank of the river,
and who had once upon a time
been saved by the knight. He found the wise man with a letter about his neck, charged with having discovered
a long hidden truth, and you know, my dear children, there is nothing more dangerous than to make and publish such a discovery.

Now there is no flout that this
magician was a brave old fellow,
who busied himself in trying to benefit humanity; he was very learned,
old and very virtuous. He was in years but always young in feeling,
and inspired the greatest confidence
in all who came near him.

The magician went to the baptism
and saw the child, who was called Herman. "My dear Theos," said the
knight, "I am anxious that my son
shall be happy, and as you know everything, you can tell me what I
must do to secure this great good."

The magician replied: "Sir knight,
you have many kinsmen who ought
to be able to assist you in this matter; call them together this evening,
and then together ask each other
to wish something for your son; I will answer that all the wishes shall
be fulfilled, but on one condition."

"That I may also form a wish for the child."

"It is no condition that you exact
from me, replied the young father,
but a very great honor that you confer.
I am sure that you only wish
to make my boy both good and happy."

"This evening, then."

At the appointed hour Yselt appeared in the great saloon of reception. In the hall arms the baby,
all molendine in white and silk stuffs,
fast asleep. Then she lay it gently
down in its cradle of gold and ivory,
while the father invited the guests to look at his heir, and told them what
the magician had engaged to do.

Immediately after Theos appeared.
Gentlemen, he said to the cavalier,
who surrounded the cradle, "The happiness is very hard to find. We all love this little one, because we love its parents, and we must all
wish for it the thing most likely to make it happy. I have the power to make your wishes certain. Speak, my friend, I am here, and I have
the father, what do you wish for
your son?"

"That he may be brave," replied
the knight.

"A noble wish," said Theos, "and it is the first that should have been made; but the boy would have been
brave in any event, for are you not
his father, and have you not the name of being one of the bravest
knights in Christendom?" The cavalier bowed.

"And you, Madam, what do you desire for your child?" asked Theos
of Yselt.

"That she shall love me as I love
him," replied the mother.

"He will love you, Madam, as soon as he is able to know you." (Here,
my reader, you will observe that Theos was a very gallant magician.)

Then turning toward the other
guests, he said to one of them,
"What do you wish for the son of our host?"

"That he may live as many years as I have lived," was the reply.

"And you?" he asked of another.

"That he may be always rich."

"And you?"

"That he may be always strong."

Still there were three more wishes;
three wishes made by the young girls—cousins of the baby.

"May he have beautiful blonde hair," said the first. And eyes blue as sapphires, added the second. And teeth like pearls, wished the third.

"Sir knight," said Theos, "your son
will have all that his kinsmen and
kinswomen have desired for him."

Selected Poetry.

RECREATION.

The low cannot be always bent,
It springs from the low to the high;
The high cannot be always bent,
It springs from the high to the low.

Dem's Nature's laws must be obeyed,
And need not be obeyed;
If we would thrive and happy be,
We must strength and intellect have.

So let this rhyme, amiable man,
And hold your own and your hate,
Remember that it may not win,
Who first leads in the race!

The man who works his honest hour,
With cheerfulness and sweet content,
Will gain more wealth and happiness,
Than if he toiled his whole day long.

Then work with will in working time,
With muscle and with teaching hand,
And you will still be resting time,
The world will still be resting same.