Apples for Cows. Can the apple crop of our country be available on the dairy farm as an auxiliary article of food for cows? Professor Arnold, in a letter to the N. Y. Tribune, says that, when fed in proper quantity, "they give an excellant flavor to milk, and the butter and cheese made from it, and increase the yield of either." We think that the same may be said of peaches, or pears, or of other fruits; but the there are plenty to except to it. They used economically—whether the im- parently, have no fancy for the pure bubthe value of the fruit and the labor school rooms and exhibit the same empty of written arithmetic may be thoroughly of preparing it. It is true that Pro-brain to their hungry pupils. "Old Moth-taught, because pupils have no books to fessor Arnold only speaks of it infer-ior fruit," and such as "is not fit for the market." Here we see an objec-tion. Inferior fruit at this season of the year means wormy, insect-eaten, weighing 1,000 pounds, can safely teaching. What a misnomer! The poet eat a peck of apples twice a day, and speaks of pouring in the "fresh instruc-"two sweet ones to one sour," and hands of many. that they be "sliced in a root cutter and fed in the stable, but they must ways studying; it is a necessity; they see be fed on the ground." Upon the whole, with very great respect for Professor Arnold, we are inclined to the opinion that the same results which he claims for apples may very generally be obtained from other sources with less expense, less labor, and less risk We should like to see a fuller report of the Professor's experiments. How many days did he feed thirty-six cows one peck per day each? How were the apples gathered and assorted, and how much labor was bestowed upon their preparation? As at present advised, we think the cases where apples may be advantageously used as a continnes food for cows, fed in the manner graphical names, by J. T. BALKY Horses.—Every oalky horse, unless it inherits the habit, is physical, but a moral one, and in THUR HEAD. most cases is acquired by the animal's being overloaded. A horse generally has a pretty definite idea of how much it ought to draw, and if this amount is exceeded balking is the very natural result. It is far more easy to prevent than than to cure the habit of balking when once acquired; no harsh treatment will ever break it Firmuess and kindness alone will avail anything. Never apply a whip to a horse when it is balking nor after it starts. Success in training and governing animals hes in one's ability to make them comfortable when they obey.-And yet how often do we see foolish drivers when a horse has balked and re-Buffalo Commercial.

tion were made early in the spring. In fields where the ground has a tendency to heave; throwing up the grass and exposing the roots to the direct action of the frost, autumn top-dressing, which will protect the ground, is much to be preferred, and the application can be made either with the aftermath, straw or manure, as the soil may seem to require. If the ground is not liable to heave, a coat of manure as early in the spring as it can be applied will insure a large crop of grass. There need be no fear of the manure interfering with the mowing of the crop or the making of the hay, inasmuch as we have found that it is soon beaten down by the rains and is quite out of reach of the operations of harvesting by the time that period arrives.—Germantown Telegraph.
