He was diligent to a degree in the performance of his duties. Hearing that complaints had been made at the Smoling Convent of the poor quality of the food provided, he resolved to test the matter for himself. So, suddenly pouncing down upon the institution one day just at the dinner hour, he walked directly toward the kitchen. At the door he met two soidiers carrying a large steaming cauldron. "Halt!" he cried; "jut that kettle down." The soldiers obeyed instantly. "Bring me a spoon," was his next order. One of the soldiers fetched a spoon, but in offering it ventured to begin a stammering remonstrance. "Hold your tongue!" commanded the Prince. "Take off the lid: I insist on tasting it." The next moment the spoon had conveyed a big portion to his mouth. "You call this soup?" he exclaimed indignantly, as soon as he swall swed the dose; "why, it is simply dirty water!" a large flock, and provided with a narrow opening towards the stream.

Into this pen the sheep are driven through an opening, temporarily made for the purpose, at the rear. One man, perhaps aided by a boy, tends the flock and passes the sheep to the washers who are standing in the stream. The sheep should have been previously tagged and freed from all large soiled clots. The washing should not be done until the water has become so warm that the sheep may not be chilled and injured.

Special care must be taken with old-or sickly sheep, and ewes that are still with lamb. An exposure of the sheep to a warm fain the day previous to the washing is an advantage, as it softens and loosens the dirt and renders the washing easier and more thorough. As the sheep are washed they should pass out upon a clean, grassy slope that rises gradually from the stream, otherwise the water-laden animals may fall and soil their fleeces. After washing, if the weaththey would be very likely to do.

From the time of washing to that of shearing, two weeks or so, the sheep should be kept in pasture that is free from any bare ground, overhanging banks or steep side hills, so that the wool may be kept clean.
