It was a battle for leadership in national affairs, and has been decided adversely to the men who provoked it, not because those men are not able and distinguished, but pecause the people have concluded to discard the methods of those men. There can no longer be any doubt > about the purpose of the masses of the Repulican party. They mean to make an end of dominating personalism in politics. They object to domination of any particular set of men, and still more they object to the use of public patronage for the aggrandizement of individuals. In this the masses are wholly right. It is for them to say how and in what behalf the Republican party shall be wield

They are intelligent and they are patriotic. They know what they want and propose to have it even at the cost of a few family quarrels.

> And Mr. Conkling is quite misaken when he speaks of a subsidized press in this connection. The press intends to represent the sentiment of the people. It does not always lead. It does not always create public sentiment. In this conflict the press has studied the temper of the masses closely, and it has barely kept abreast of the well-defined public sentiment.
