

the paddle box in company with eleven others. One, however, soon left for another piece, and others remained until relieved by death. We stood in the water up to our knees, the sea frequently breaking over us. We separated from our friends of the wreck, and passed the night, each expecting every hour to be his last.

The morning came, but not a living soul could be seen but our own party, consisting of seven men. About noon Mr. S. M. Woodruff, of New York, was relieved by death, and all the others now began to suffer severely from the want of water except George L. Allen and myself. Night at last came on, thick and dreary, with our minds made up that neither of us would see the light of another day. Very soon three more of our suffering party were relieved by death, and Mr. Allen, a young man and myself, were all that were now left, and were much exhausted. We slept for a while during the night, and became somewhat refreshed.

About an hour before daylight on Friday, the 29th, we saw a vessel's light near us. We all exerted ourselves to the utmost of our abilities in hailing, but the light disappeared to the eastward of us. Soon after daylight a bark hove in sight to the northwest. The fog having lightened a little we observed that she was steering apparently for us, but in a short time she appeared to have changed her course again, and we were doomed to bitter disappointment—yet I feel hopes that some of our fellow sufferers may have been seen and rescued by them.

Shortly after a ship was discovered to the eastward, steering directly for us. As they approached they fortunately discovered a man on a raft near them, and succeeded in saving him. This man saved is a Frenchman, who was a passenger on board the steamer with which we came in collision. He informed the captain that others were on pieces of the wreck, and he proceeded to cruise around in search of them. We were taken on board about 3 o'clock, P. M., after an exposure of 46 hours, in a most exhausted condition.

Shortly after Mr. James Smith, of Mississippi, was discovered and rescued. About dusk another piece of the wreck, with five of our firemen, was discovered, and the sufferers rescued. None others could be found.

Captain Luce adds, that at the time of the collision the anchor of the steamer Vesta was drawn through the bows of the Arctic about 18 inches above the water line, and an immense hole had been made at the same instant by the fluke of the anchor about two feet below the water line, raking the fore and aft plank, and finally breaking its chain, left the stock remaining in and through the Arctic, which rendered the attempt to draw a sail around the bow of the vessel impracticable.

THE NUMBER OF LOST AND SAVED.
The report that the Vesta had rescued a number of the passengers and crew being incorrect, reduces the number of saved in three boats to 77, of whom 20 were passengers and 57 officers and crew. To these we now add Captain Luce and three other passengers and 5 of the seamen, making a total of 24 passengers and 62 of the crew. The New York Times says: Gourley's boat, containing himself, three sailors and the boatswain, Rogers' boat with 11 persons, and the sixth boat, containing a number of ladies, some accounts say twenty-one, remain to be heard from. Another boat, the largest of the number, was not launched when the last party of whose safety we are advised left the wreck. If launched, she could have held 100 persons.

ARRIVAL OF CAPTAIN LUCE—FURTHER PARTICULARS.

Captain Luce left Montreal on Monday morning for New York. When the train from the north reached Troy, nearly five thousand people had collected at the depot in that city to greet him, and it was with great difficulty that he was transferred to the Hudson River Railroad cars on which the Superintendent had generously set apart a car for his use and that of his friends. He was met at Troy by Mr. S. H. Fearing, his brother-in-law. Accompanying him were Mr. George F. Allen, of New York, Mr. James Smith, of Natchez, Miss., and Ferdinand Keyn, a young German who was rescued with him.

As soon as Captain Luce was seated, he was greeted by scores and hundreds of people, who insisted on shaking him by the hand. Several ladies came with daguerotypes of their lost friends, to ascertain if he could recognize them and give them any intelligence of their fate. At all the stations where he stopped, Captain Luce was greeted with cheers, and when the train reached Yonkers, the place of his residence, he found two long lines of citizens formed, through which he passed, receiving warm congratulations and a hearty welcome.

From Captain Luce, the reporter of the Times, in the course of conversation, obtained information on a variety of interesting topics, which we present below.

PROSPECTS OF THE SAFETY OF OTHERS.
"I think it is quite possible," said Capt. Luce, "and not at all improbable, that we will ultimately hear of the safety of others. At this season, most of the vessels that pass near the spot are outward bound, and I see no reason why others may not have been picked up, the same as I and my companions were. After the gale, however, of the Saturday following, I think there was no possible chance for any who were on the pieces of wreck to be saved. They must have perished. Those who were in the boats, however, would ride out the gale in safety, and might have been picked up days after; and provided the boat was properly managed, by having her head kept to the sea, I do not see why the occupants need suffer materially from the heavy seas."

THE SINKING OF THE ARCTIC—DEATH OF CAPTAIN LUCE'S SON.
The Arctic settled stern foremost. She went over gradually, until the upper deck got level with the water, when the sea swept over us.

"As I went down," said Captain Luce, "after the sinking of the vessel, I was carried down a great distance, with my son Willie in my arms. I opened my eyes to see if I could discover light through the water. It was some time before I could do so, and then it seemed a very long time before I reached the surface. When I did so I could only have held out a few moments. I saw Willie near me with a life preserver on him, and was just struggling to reach him when a piece of the paddle-box came up with great force and fell upon him, striking him upon the head.

"I struggled to get away, and on looking around, I saw that the box was sliding down the water. A short distance back, poor little Willie was lying dead. During my struggle, I had cut my head badly, which caused it to bleed very profusely, and I was compelled for some time afterwards to wash it frequently to keep the blood from blinding my eyes. Mr. Allen and I got upon the paddle-box at the same time. By some it is supposed, from the newspaper accounts, that the piece we were on was the entire paddle-box. This is not so: it was only a part of it, about twelve feet square, and we stood in the concave.

"Some eight or ten others got on the same fragment with us. During the time we were there all the food we had was a small broiled chicken, which Mr. Allen had taken from the table before leaving the ship. This was divided among those who were on board. I did not suffer at all from hunger or thirst. After the ships hove in sight I felt some thirst and considerable exhaustion, but so far as the want of food was concerned, I think I could have got along for a long time.

"We had a small trunk on the wreck, from the contents of which we supposed it belonged to some female nurse. As late as the early part of the last night there were six of us remaining, of whom three fell down from exhaustion, and were washed off by the sea. Young Keyn, the German boy who was with us, suffered intensely. He happened to have some biscuit with him, which had become soaked with the salt water, and eating these only increased his thirst, and to make matters worse, he drank some of the sea water. His sufferings were beyond all description. Twice he jumped overboard, saying he would rather die than suffer as he was doing; and each time we pulled him back on the wreck. At one time he cut open a vein in his arm and sucked his blood. The last time he jumped over was about 15 minutes before we discovered the Cambria.

At daybreak we discovered to the northward of us a sail steering directly toward us. At length she changed her course and steered away. About fifteen minutes after Keyn was rescued from self-destruction a second time, Mr. Allen discovered a sail standing for us. She was about seven miles off. She was seen through an arch which seemed to form in the fog, and gave us a clear view through it directly in the line of the ship. She continued standing towards us, but after a while changed her course. Upon this our spirits again drooped. It was during the time that she was thus manœuvring that she picked up the Frenchman, who had belonged to the Vesta, and he immediately informed the officers of the Cambria—which proved to be her name—that there were probably other survivors in the vicinity, upon which Captain Russell went aloft with his spyglass, and discovered us. He stood towards us, took us first on board, then Mr. Smith, then a piece of wreck containing three firemen, and another with two others.
