Deities of the Enemy.

As usual, an apparent reverence to our arms—always the result, however of taking their own advice in the conduct of war, but brings out the Copperheads with their judgment, McClellan, on the same principle, we suppose, that the remedy for the bite of the dog is supposed to reside in a hair of the animal itself. Thus, while Pennsylvania is invaded, and the Federal army is in a double eclipse, the air is full of reports that the luller at Federal camp, the grave-digger of the Chickamauga—the burayer of Fort—the laggard of the Union—the idol of the "peace-at-any-price" patriots—who is a hero because he won't fight—the man who has nursed this rebellion by his cowardice—allowed our capital to be held under siege and its gateway to the ocean blockaded for months by a contemptible foe, in the sight of all Christendom, and without the effort to prevent it, and threw away a year of golden opportunity to a great army, which can never be recalled—was not to be covered with shame and dishonour, but to be furnished with the means of destroying another army, and commanding the public ruin, which he has already so well-nigh achieved.

Lee's Invasion.

When Lee and the council of arch-bishops at Richmond, finding that something must be done to retrieve the disasters to which the "Confederacy" in the West, and to recover that almost lost prestige of good fortune which the incapacity, timidity, or perhaps worse still, of some of our West Point Generals, who had worn the laurels of the "Golden Circle" before the "stars" of command decked their shoulders, had suffered them so long to appropriate, decided to undertake an invasion of the North, it was of course the most important thing to decide in the second place, where along the border would be the most advantageous point to move upon, and in what Northern State, or part of a State, could the bold project be conducted most favorably carried out.
