Who is Responsible for Lee's Escape?

There is a great deal of absurdity in the statements put forth for the purpose of shifting the responsibility of the rebel escape. It is asserted that General Halleck ordered Gen. Meade not to attack the rebels at Williamsport, but to surround them if possible. This is untrue, for General Halleck has feared ever since the rebel forces reached the river banks that they would succeed in crossing unless a battle was precipitated upon them; and his fears were fully realized by the neglect to attack them. As long ago as last Thursday and Friday when everybody anticipated a decisive conflict, Gen. Halleck urged an attack.

Gen. Meade, on the other hand, placed great reliance in his corps commanders who were in front, and most of whom represented to him that the position of the enemy was not only an excellent one, but well entrenched, and there were therefore doubts of the success of an attack at that time. We then drew up defensive works for use in case of disaster, but by the time they were completed and our forces commenced to press in the enemy's lines it was found that he had quietly crossed on a single bridge just below Williamsport—his rear-guard being captured on the Maryland side of the bridge by shells thrown in front of them by our light batteries accompanying the cavalry.

At one time the entire rebel forces were compressed into a space of three by four miles, with the Potomac on every side of them but one, and with but the single bridge to get away on. The position taken by the enemy in this peninsula (as I wrote you at the time) was a most dangerous one, and should have resulted in his capture, for an attack at the proper time could hardly have ended in anything else. The rebel entrenchments were found to be formidable only in one or two places, and could not have served much of a purpose. Careful estimates show that our army, exclusive of Cochrane's forces, outnumbered the enemy about three to one. So end the second rebel invasion. We shall never have another, nor probably such an opportunity to put a final quietus on the army that made it.

The Changes in the Military Situation.

We find the following on this subject in a recent letter from a well-informed correspondent at Washington:

Events develop themselves so rapidly from the sudden shifting of the scenes of the army of the Potomac, that it would be no easy matter to keep pace with them, were it not for the fact that both Federal and rebel armies are again passing old land-marks and touching up with additional interest places already rendered famous during the wearisome and eventful campaigns in Northern and Eastern Virginia. The rebel army, cheered by the successful escape from Maryland, is resuscitating its exhausted energies in the Shenandoah valley, near Winchester, having sent forward sufficient guards to hold Snicker's, Ashby's and Manassas gaps in the Blue Ridge, so that when they resume their advance, or rather their retreat, they will hold the gateways to the short line through the Loudon valley, in or outside of the Bull Run mountains, to the plains of Manassas or to the Rappahannock, as circumstances must soon dictate.

This rebel advance, if it be not already commenced, cannot be much longer delayed—in fact if Lee feels confident enough we may still have a general battle in a short time on the old Bull Run ground, despite the hindrances which have thus far prevented a third contest in this historical place. But it looks now as though the whole question would be whether we can get a fight out of Gen. Lee at any point this side of the Blue Ridge. As he cannot well accept battle until he receives reinforcements, it is fair to presume that he will not go into a fight unless compelled. Many days, and even weeks, must elapse before any collision can occur, during which the entire situation may undergo radical changes, or it may resolve itself into a twice-told tale.
