Symptoms of Collapse—The Breakdown of the Government.

While our armies are apparently motionless under the splendor of August sun, and only an occasional skirmish comes to stir the leaves, and rattle the surface of the waters, the symptoms of a general collapse of the rebellion are multiplying in every direction.

For the first time in its tragic history, we hear a wail of woe—a mingled burden of rage, reproach, and despair—coming up from those monsters of humanity, the forces and untamable spirits of the Southern press—the bloody Dantons—the hall-engendered blood-heads—who have bayed in advance of the whole infernal pack, their jaws dripping with the gore of butchered innocents, and their bloodshot eyes staring with savage phrensy, at the glorious perspective of new fields of carnage under northern skies.

The people do not respond to the heart-rending appeals of Davis and his henchmen. The troops of Pennsylvania are disciplined upon the starving camp of James Lee, only to eat out, demoralize and decimate his ranks, and then turned loose beyond the Mississippi, to seek their homes, from which they never can be recalled.

Do Radical Measures Unite the South? The shameful method that the Confederation act and the Emancipation Proclamation have called the South has gone far enough. The assertion of a proposition does not demonstrate its truth; but it will preserve it sometimes is accepted as a reality; and for this reason we desire to call attention to the utter lack of faith of the plain dealer in the Overland newspapers and politicians upon this point.
