A policy of the p this power of originating war was committed, but seen in their hands it was restrained by the limitation of biennal appropriations for the support of the armies they might raise. Of course, no army could be raised or supported which did not command popular approbation, and it was rightly considered that voluntary enlistments would never be wanting to recruit the ranks of anch army. The war power, existing only for the protection of the people, and left as fay as it was possible to leave it in their own hands, was incapable of being used without their consent, and, therefore, could here ranguish for enlistments. They would here ready enough to recruit the ranks of any army they doemed necessary for their castey. Thus the theory of the constitution placed this great power, fike all other governmental powers, directly upon the consent of the governed. The theory itself was founded on free and fair elections—which are the fundamental potulate of the constitution. If the patronsee and consent of the government of the government that the constitution of the patronsee of the constitution. If the patronage and power of the government shall ever be employed to control popular elections, the nominal representatives, and then the armies nominal representatives, and then the armies which may be raised may not so opinmand public confidence as to attract the necessary recruits, and then conscript laws and other extra bonstitutional expedients may become necessary to fill the ranks. But governmental interpresent with propulse a lection will be tal interference with popular elections will be subversion of the constitution, and no consti-tutional argument can assume such a possibil-ity. Supposing then that the people are always to be fairly represented in the halls of Congress, I maintain that it is grevious injustice to them to legislate on the assumption that any war honestly waged for constitutional objects will not always have such sympathy and sets will not stawys more such sympasty and support from the people as will secure all mec-essary enlistments. Equally unjust to their intelligence is it to suppose that they meant to confer on their servants the power to impress them into a war which they could not approve. When to these considerations we add the martial for trial under military law? This question touches the foundations of personal liberty.

The opinion closes as follows:
The only general reason that I have ever heard suggested, and which is applicable against all the views advanced in this opinion, is called military necessity. The country is involved in a great civil war which can be brought to an honorable close only by an energetic use of all our resources, and no restraint should be tolerated, in such circumstances, any only those which christian civil brought to an honorable close only by an energetic use of all our resources, and no restraint should be tolerated, in such circumstances, as are only those which christian divilization has imposed on all warfare. Whatever is according to the Constitution, the argument claims, may be done, of course—whatever is over and beyond the constitution is justified as military necessity, and of that the President and Congress are exclusive and final judges.

The amount of the argument is that the exigencies of the times justify the substitution of martial law for the Constitution. But what is martial law for the Constitution, and Hr. Mathew Hate tell us "it is built upon no sattled principles, but is entirely arbitrary in its deciation, is in truth and reality in law, but semething indulged rather than showed as law." The unrestrained will of one or a number of man, is the rate which the argument substitutes for the Constitution. It is of no consequence that the will thus set up for supreme law is that of men whech a majority of the people have chosen, because, according to our system, the majority can only choose man to administer the Constitution as it is written. Majorities, as a power recognized by law, have no more right to establish a despoism than a minority would have. But may majorities or minorities, set aside the Constitution under pressure of rebellion and insurrection? As the Constitution as it is written. Such as a substitution and provides for such calamities, it is in represent upon it. No current experience proves it. It never can be proved except by an unsuccessful use of the legitimate powers of the Constitution against rebellion, and then the thing proved, will be that the instrument needs amendment, which its machinery is flexible enough to allow. Even such a melancholy demonstration would no more than point our necessary amendments—it would not surrender the people to the arbitrary will lof, saylody. Presidents Even such a molancholy demonstration would do no more than point out necessary amendments—lik would not surrender the people to the arbitrary will of anybody. Presidents and Congressmen are only servants of the people, to do their will, not as that will may be expressed under passion or exolument, but if the Constitution, indeed, which makes them Desidents and Congressment.
