This is the old story. "We can never upon the Copperhead platform. On the subdue the South," say all the Copper other hand, the name of Olivas P. Morton, at San Francisco from Japan contradicts This is the old-slory. The subdue the South," say all the Copperheads, in audacious disregard of the events of the past two years. We can subdue the Rebellion; we are doing it every day; and we would have ended the unboly things year ago if the Coxes and Vallaydona's, and Ferhand Woods, and George B. MCLellars, and John L. Dawsors of the North had not adopted a "politoy" and a "strate gy" that gave more aid to the Rebellion than half its armies. We venture to say that no speech dallvered in the Rebel Congress which has just adjourned will be more generally read by Jeyf. Davis's followers than the speech upon which we are commenting.

No better proof than this is wanted that the South looks to the Copperhands of the Morth, sming whom Mr. Dawor comples a prominent place, for assistance in over-throwing the Union party as a preliminary to scruring. The "independence of the Biates." How far Mr. Dawor's speech will go to encourage, the South to continue the strongle, it is not difficult to infer.

Mr. Dawor's concludes his speech with an illustration, drawn from his reading of the history of the Middle Ages, which he mee to express his entire lack of concludes the proceedied alone from a convertice that fillustration, drawn from his reading of the history of the Middle Ages, which he mee to express his entire lack of concludes the proceedied alone from a convertice that the South was gesting weary of the Plancet of the Ohlo Legistration, drawn from utter destrongle to save the Union from utter destrongle.
