they have followed the example of the Ohio Democracy, who, notwithstanding expressed differences of opinion, found no difficulty in adopting a platform upon which they could all stand. Indeed, the Democracy everywhere is just now striving to consolidate its broken ranks and thus make success during the coming campaign possible event. To secure this consolidation. they are willing th consede here a little and there a little of individual opinion—the success of the party being of vastly more importance to the leaders than any asset tion of principle whatever.

The proceedings of the Philadelphia Con vention furnish striking evidence of the truth of this last assertion. Fortunately for the delegates, there were no candidate to be nominated for State offices, and they were thus spared the perplexity which would have arisen had they been compelled to choose war or peace Democrats for their standard bearers. What they would have done, if compelled to do anything, we know fall well; but, as no ticket was required of slightest evidence that such a result is to them, they gained somewhat by not showing their hands. To improve this advantage, a set of resolutions was adopted which beg tion for the Presidency! the whole question of a platform of principles by granting permission to the delegates to the Chicago Convention to voto for any batch of principles that may seem at the time best calculated to "elect a President" of the Demogratic persuasion. There are three of these resolutions, and they might well have taken the syllogistic form:
