Notwithstanding the extreme inclemency of the weather, Concert Hall was crowded last evening to its extremest corners to hear the lec-iure of this cloquent young lady upon "The Meaning of the Election." The subject was a grand one, and grandly did the speaker rise to it. With graphle force she traced the progress of epinion from the low point it occupied at the beginning of this way, up through its successive stages, marked by toll and agony and blood, to the grand uttrance of a nation baptisied in blact, as pronounced by the election of the Sin of Norember. But that was not enough; the goal is not yet reached; and she pointed forward
