Both these men were very much depressed over their misfortune, and expressed the deepest regret bits they had not remained concealed for a day or two. They had gone down the river immediately after leaving the prison, with the intention of crossing to the other side, and get-ling a change of clothing at the house of a friend of Raskin. Hence their awriety to get a skiff induced them to walk right into the arms of the officers before they were aware of their danger. Their distress at being receptured excited the sympathy of their duty to hold on to them. They had no expectation of making such a balk, however, at that particular time and place.
