In those days, only the sons of wealthy men received more than a very limited ed-ucation. Jesse R. Grant was not of that fortunate class. Ill's father removed from Westmoreland county, Pennsylvania, in the last decade of the eighteenth century, to the Connecticut Western Reserve, and the only schooling Jesserecelved was while living in the family of Judge Tod, (father of David Tod, inte Governor,) in Youngs-town, (now in Mahoning county,) "and-that," said the old man, "as I had to chop wood for two fires, and do other chores, was very little." It was while living on the Reserve that the news came of the death of Washington. Jesse, then five years of age, observing his mother weeping, asked her what was the matter. "General Washington is dead !" she replied. "Was he any relation of yours?" inquired the wondering child. "And that," said the vetran, 'was the first I knew of the Fathe of his Country." Georgetown, in 1823, was rather an un-promising village—hard to get at, as, in-deed, as it is now—the adjacont country being very hilly, and the roads painful to encounter, and ulficult to get over. He followed here the trade to which he had been bred, that of tanner. The old tan yard, now out of nee, is in the castorn part of the village, on the opposite sld§ of the street from the substantial two-story brick house which Mr. Grant built, and in which he resided for many years. The lad, as it is said, was remarkable for this tact in managing horses. He "broke" them with an ease that astonished the vil-lagers, and eren before he was twelve years of age, men came from considerable distances to have him learn their horses to pace. It required some strategy to obtain his consent, but whenever he undertook it he always succeded. There are a great many stories afloat in the reighborhood, of Grant's loyhood days, some of which are doubless spoory-phal, and all need authentication before being committed to paper. He did not ex-hibit remarkable aptitude or brilliancy as a scholar, that I heard of, but had the repu-tation of doing whatever he essayed, and doing it thoroughly and well.
