FREE TRADE A DELUSION. Some political philosophers have speci lated upon the excellence and practicabili of Free Trade, just as others of the sam class have theorized upon the Perfectibili of Human Nature. All these speculations amount to nothing beyond displaying the dialectic skill and the logical subtleties of the persons indulging in them. Whatever possibilities may be latent in man's nature, to perfection. This dream of sanguine humanitarians seems to be as far off in the indefinite inture as it ever was. Precisely so is it with Free Trade. Philosophers have speciated about it. Statesmen have made a wordy hobby of it when desiring by craft

Perhaps that phrase, advanced nations, is misleading, because partial and inadequate. By advanced nations we mean such as have redundant population, whereby the labor market is overstocked, and wages reduced by competion to just sufficient for the obtainment of the absolute necessaries of life; as have the largest amount of accumulated capital, in buildings, ahips, machinery and money, whereby the employers have the advantage of operating on a broader basis against outside rivals, and have vasily superior means of coercion against the workmen employed; and as have undommon advantages of commercial position and natural preductions.

On the same principle, if a nation has sun a particular branch or branches of production, it can undoubtedly proffer freedom peoples resting under less favorable couditions in respect to the growth or fabrication of those special articles. This is substantiand what the printer or tailor does who offers to compete with the carpenter or mason in making newspapers or coats. Bu to dignify this proffer, or the actualizing of it, with the name of Free Trade, is a mani-

If England is con scious of possessing superior advantages to France in the growth or manufacture o any one or more things, she discourses loudly of the excellence of Free Trade both as a theory and a practice. If France has a branch of production in which she has clearly the advantage of England, she, in turn, vaunts the utility of Free Trade Much as these two great powers have talk-
