Tyler had taken the parlor bedroom at the Rochester House, and the night being rather warm, they took out the lower sash of the front window, near which on a chair their clothing lay. Mr Tyler's pocket book was undisturbed, and from this fact it is argued that no professional thief did the job. The man repiled that be had a room in the house .-Kinney replied that the proprietors of the house did not allow boarders to enter in that way. The man then let bimself down by the telegraph pole, and walked off up town. The same man was seen to enter the bouse again afterwards by some of the men at work in the cellar of the bank build ing. This forenoon, as soon as Mr. Kinney heard of the robbery, he proceeded up town and arrested a man known by the name of Jacob Stafford, alias the "Billiard Player," as being the person he saw coming out of the Rechester House early in the morning. He was found lying asleep and very drunk. under Akin's Hall. About two weeks since this man registered his name at the Rochceter House as Thompson. There was something suspicious in his conduct at the time and he has since been refused a room. 'At one o'clock the bouse was closed, and the property safe as the two gentlemen were awake at that hour. Circumstances point strongly to Stafford as the guilty party. He was placed in the lock-up, and as soon as he sold is up will have an examina-
