A SOUTHERN ELECTION SCENE.—Georgia is usurping the fame of Arkansas. A lively fight in a small place in Worth county, that State, is thus described: "There was an election for Justice of the Peace being held and the sovereigns, after attending to that matter and putting themselves outside of four gallons of whisky and schnapps, all there was at the place, very naturally looked around for some diversion. Jim Bass caused the small mail carrier, and Nep Taber took up for the mail carrier, and then Bill Keen and his two sons took up for Jim, and then the fight opened along the whole line. Pistols, knives, bludgeons, fence rails, weights, fists and whisky went in for one indiscriminate sandango, and one report says that every man in the crowd except two, was engaged either as belligerent, peace maker or spectator. When the smoke of battle cleared away the scene of blood and carnage was appalling. Jim Keen was dangerously cut on the hip, Nep Taber was dangerously cut in the abdomen and side; Gus Scott, an innocent looker-on, was shot fatally in the abdomen. Phil Ford, colored, cut in shoulder and arm, head split open with bludgeon and the pieces pitched out at the window. Bill Keen and his other son and a stranger cut more or less severely, and many others bruised and lugged in the highest style of the art. We were glad to learn, late yesterday, that all the wounded are doing well and likely to recover. Phil, the colored troop, picked up his pieces and had a blacksmith to weld him. He will not die."

In September last a young man named Cale, telegraph operator on the Cross-cut Railroad, married a worthy young lady, the daughter of a widow. Soon after the marriage the scamp disclosed his true character by turning his mother-in-law out of her own house, and neglecting and shamefully abusing his wife. Through a sister of the injured wife her brother, residing in California, was informed of her wrongs, and without delay he started for his old home. Arriving at Clymer, he walked into the telegraph office, and inquired of the operator if his name was Cale. On receiving an affirmative answer, the brother introduced himself, at the same time laying a revolver on the table. He then drew a cowhide and proceeded to give the fellow a sound thrashing, and afterwards called upon his sister and mother, both of whom returned with him to his home in California.
