The town of Manson, Mass., has been for some time troubled by a supposition visitant from the spirit world. The ghost was in the form of a black-robed female, some six feet eight inches tall, and of a singular quaint and forbidden aspect. It happened first into a youth who was going on his tri weekly courting expedition, and caused him to progress somewhat more celeritously than usual, and present himself before his lady love in a breathless and disheveled condition. A quarryman was next accosted and thrown into a state of coma. The news being noised abroad, the villagers became utterly subdued by fear, and ventured forth only in bands. The luckless lover was soon again interviewed by the disagreeable stranger, and the palpitation of his heart was measurably increased. The woods were searched by trembling parties; the roads were bushwacked by squads of armed men, and one individual was so nervous that he shot himself while hunting for the ghost; and still no ghost could be brought to bay. At last, in some way it leaked out that the celestial intruder was none other than the brother of the lover's sweetheart, who took this manner of showing his disapprobation of the courtship. Wherefore, Manson breathes reer.

A Massachusetts citizen who was recently elected a justice of the peace, took the first step in his new career by providing himself with a law library, consisting of a copy of the revised statutes and a volume of Shakespeare. He read both works diligently, but the Shakespearian book seemed to strike him most favorably. The other day he gave his opinion confidentially to a friend that he didn't suppose there were twenty men in Massachusetts who could have writ ten such a volume.
