A case of disappointed love, conjugal bliss blasted, cherished hopes hovering down the wind of cruel infidelity, came under our observation on Friday last, which is likely to lead to some litigation, and development rich, rare and racy, if the matter is not amicably adjusted by some living concessions upon the part of the standing off bridegroom. As near as our reporter could glean the facts, they are nearly these: About three weeks since, at a dance, this blushing couple met, looked and loved—the old story, love at first sight. They are not of the upper ten, and to our knowledge, lay no claim to a long line of ancestry through whose veins flowed the crimson current of stamped nobility; but they are from the humbler class—from the cottage lowly, from the bone and sinew of the land, and their love was the love of giants. It waxed warm and grew in strength, until our Adonis could no longer forego the jewel within his reach he loathed that she should be his—his only and accordingly propounded. The maiden whose heart was not of adamant, listened to the Quixotic tales of this modern Moor as only trusting and cooing maidens can listen, and

"She swore.—In faith, 'twas strange, 'twas passing strange;
'Twas pitiful, 'twas wondrous pitiful;
She wished that she had not heard it; yet she wished

That heaven had made her such a man."
The heavenly vision of a cottage by the sea, clam chowder and fresh oysters was too much for our little heroine, and, like Niobe, all tears, she confessed her soul and made him the guardian of her heart forever and for aye. Last Friday they were to go to Oil City, the metropolis of Venango county, and there and then be united as man and wife. Thursday night came; the lovers were to have one more meeting ere they launched their boat upon the tide of time, and moved down the map of the world as

"Two souls with but a single thought,
Two hearts that beat as one."
Dressed in her neatest, she was indeed the picture of loveliness as she sat peering through the window into the darkness, watching the coming of her hope—her lord and master. The sun went down as usual, the shadows of night came on apace, the blue of heaven was dotted here and there with innumerable stars, while up out of the eastern horizon god like, rose Jupiter to throw kisses across the sea of blue to the bright-eyed and brilliant Venus who was retiring for the night down the horizon of the west. He was to have been on hand at eight, it was now eleven, and still the maiden waited. Twelve o'clock was ushered in and past down the past among the ghosts of hours gone before, and he came not.

"Oh, Robinson Crusoe, how could you do so! How could you do so, how could you do so!"
Our reporter was looking upon that countenance at the time expecting a storm, a whirlwind of passion, agony, grief and despair, expecting to see those flood gates of the soul open and drown us in tears, but we were doomed to disappointment; there was a sigh, a gentle swirl of the bosom, a compression of the lips as if of some stern resolve, and the simple remark, which means volumes when translated into English—"If Jack thinks he can trade with my affection, with impunity, he's barking up a hollow tree."

"Then come to the old gum tree, come to the old gum tree,
Come where de'coon and de possum be, come and join our joyal dance."

You all want to know whom this fair angel in prospective bliss was—we lip her name with reverential awe—it was Emma! Who was the wretch that promised this fair Basheba and took water? Who was the wretch that blighted the fond hopes of this lovely maiden—this blushing blonde of thirty summers? Was it Jones, or Smith, or Varian?

"We have met, we have loved,
We have parted, broken hearted."
Oh Jack, my boy Jack, how could you? Be just and wise and fear not, take the blossom to your heart and cherish, love, honor and protect.

About the best story told lately is of a wealthy New York German and a Harford livery stable keeper, who was loth to let his best rig to a stranger, The German was bound to have his ride, and agreed to buy the horse and sleigh, and when he returned the stable keeper might refund the money. This was done, and the team returned and the money refunded, when the German started to go. "Hold on," said the man of the horses; "you have not paid your horses hire." "Why, my dear sir," said the New Yorker coolly, "I have been driving my own team this morning."

A DREAM OF SPRING.

The world is asleep, all hushed in Nature's warm, sweet breath;
The world is asleep, and dreaming the silent dreams of snow,
But through the silence that seems like the silence of death,
Under the shroud of ermine, the souls of the roses glow.

And forever the heart of the water throbs and beats,
Though bound by million gleaming, fetters and crystal wings;
No sound on loomsome mornings the lonely watcher greets,
But the frosty pane is impressed with the shadow of coming wings.

The pugilists in the Hicken-Campbell were on time in the ring today, which was pitched on a frosty and snow covered ground, at Collier Station, West Virginia.

They had great difficulty in getting a referee. Siddons finally acted as referee. Twenty-three rounds were fought. On the twenty-fourth round the ring was broken by the Campbell crowd, and Ned O'Baldwin narrowly escaped with his life. He was beaten and kicked, and a dozen pistols were pointed at him. The referee lit out of town, and Hicken claims the stake. Hicken is not even scratched, while Campbell has a hard looking face. Time of fight, sixty-five minutes.

A San Francisco telegram says that the Modoc chief, Jack, objects to Applegate and Meacham, two of the Commissioners appointed by the Administration to treat for peace with the hostile Modocs now in the lava bed. We noticed in the San Francisco Chronicle that the commissioners appointed by the President is condemned by many as composed of men towards whom the Indians are particularly hostile, and towards whom the Indians have reason to feel savage, inasmuch as said, commissioners have been among the foremost in maltreating the Indians and in fleeing them and Uncle Sam also. The commissioners are Case, Meacham and Applegate, and it is very doubtful whether these men can accomplish anything with the Modocs. It will be noticed that the squaws sent into the Modoc camp report that the chiefs of the band are anxious to have a talk, and are "ready to talk with those men that come from a long way off." Evidently that means that the Indians are suspicious of the white settlers and wish to treat with white men from a distance who are not identified with the difficulties between the Indians and white settlers.
