[For the Philadelphia Evening Bulletin.] FAITHFUL UNTO DEATH.

Suggested by an incident related by Mr. Gough in his lecture on "Peculiar People." Supposed to be the narration of an old nurse in one of the hospitals. He was brought in with the wounded, six bullets in his frame; We knew we could not save him, but we tried to, all the ame, And when we'd washed and fed h m, I sat down by his side To tell him of the Saviour, and be with him when he diea. He lay there still and peaceful, and listened to the It seemed an old friend to him, by his happy, trusting look,

And then we prayed beside him, for we are no heathens here. But try to help our brothers when the hour of death draws near. His breath came short and painful and his words were faint and low, As he gave his farewell messages, I bent to hear «His love and thanks to mother, he had tried to do his best. He'd often read her Bible, she would find it in his chest. It had been a comfort to him, but the balls had found her boy, And she would soon come to him in realms o endless joy."

There was a pause, a falter; I asked him. "nothing more?" And with a flush he quickly drew off a ring h «Send this to mother, Madam, and tell her I was true To the one who gave it; she will know what I would have her do.' And then the bright flush faded, and a deadly paleness came, And I knew his heart was breaking for the one h could not name.

Just then along the passage, between the rowso Came on a group of ladies, with red roses in their heads.

And colors gay and flaunting were mingled in their dress, And they talked and laughed out gaily, in the sight of such distress! I frowned upon them grimly and tried to stop their noise, It there's one thing makes me angry, 'tis unkind ness to the boys,) But their hearts were hard and selfish, and they would not beed my frown,

But came on near the pillow where I watched Beath settling down. They stopped there, and a tall one, the handsomest

Spoke out in tones as flippant as tho' at dance or Spoke to the man just dying, with questioning far amiss. "My friend, pray tell me truly, was the country worth all this?"

Life came back for a moment and he rose up in his Forgetful of his sufferings, as with steady voice be "Aye! Madam, the dear country is worth it, worth it all! 4 I pray our God to save it, tho' a million men should fall!" His latest word for Freedom, he tottered back, and The ladies turned away their heads; I do believe they cried. I closed his eyelids sobbing, I have looked on many a death, But never saw I soldier give more gladly life and breath. They laid him down to slumber in the crowded army-lot,

And in a leisure moment, I put flowers above the spot, But whenever I go near it, I think—he is not there, He's where the "faithful unto death" a crown of glory wear. M. T. C. WILMINGTON, Delaware, Feb. 1, 1861.
