MR. DOOLITTLE'S SPEECH. One of the ablest and most eloquent speeches yet delivered in Congress on the vexed question of reconstruction was made yesterday by Hon. Mr. Doo little, of Wisconsin, and it can scarcely fail to tell powerfully upon the future action of Congress, both in reference to the President and toward the Southern States. Without going into the minor details of reconstruction, the Senator from Wisconsin argues with great force that Mr. Johnson is following closely in the footsteps of his illustrious predecessor, and working out his plan of restoring the revolted States to their "practical relations to the Union." He shows that, under the circumstances of his ac-head of our armies in the storm of battle and in the hour of victory, over the sea as well as over the land, that sacred ensign which, next to the God of heaven, we love and re-verence as representing the good, the great and the true everywhere, bears thirty-six stars, and thereby proclaims to the world the great fundamental national truth that there as thirty six United States and all others in authority are to have the advantage of the prayers of the flocks over which Bishops Elliott and Wilmer preside, with their entire sanction. cession to the Presidency, it was next to impossible that Mr. Johnson could have departed from Mr. Lincoln's well understood policy. That policy had been advised by every member of the Cabinet, and a departure from it would not only have arrayed the Cabinet and the country against him, but "the last great speech of Mr. Lincoln, like a voice from his grave, an angel trumpet-tongued, would have pleaded against it."

Mr. Doolittle, after establishing the identity of Mr. Johnson's course with the purposes of Mr. Lincoln, passes to the discussion of the question whether the rebel States were out of the Union. He asserts that they never were, and never could be. They !tried to vote themselves out peaceably, and failed. They tried to fight their way out at the most unrelenting foes. point of the bayonet, and they failed. The only other possible way was for Congress to put them out. The speaker brought a forcible figure into his argument for the inherent integrity of a State in spite of temporary changes in its form of government, when he asserted that "for a State to change its government for the time being, or be stripped of all form of government, no more destroys its existence than a man is destroyed when he takes off one coat to carde! We pause for a reply. put on another, or is stripped entirely of his garments."

In his bold and telling speech, the Western Senator leaves no room for any doubt as to his position towards the rebellion itself and its guilty leaders. For these, he has no sympathy, and he denounces their crime as one that has had no parallel in this world's history. And because of the greatness of the crime there was no extremity of legislation, no expenditure of blood, no accumulation of debt incurred for its suppression that is not justified before God and man.

Convention will never meet. A great speech, like this of Senator Doolittle's, is an honor to the Senate and to the country. To a statesmanship like Webster's, it adds the patriotic fire of Patrick Henry and the glowing eloquence of Henry Clay. It gives the assurance that the race of men which once made the American Senate so famous is not yet altogether extinct. Under the inspiration of great times and great questions, the men of the present are months, they now seem proving themselves fit successors to the men of the past, and it inspires the lover of his country with new and bright hopes for the future, to read such a speech as that of vesterday, as full of cogent reasoning, lofty patriotism, sterling statesmanship and glowing eloquenceas many of those that helped to make the fame of Webster and Clay and Benton and Douglas. We cannot refrain from closing this imperfect sketch with the enthusiastic burst of eloquence with which Senator Doolittle concluded his speech: "The flag of our country bears thirty-six stars as the emblem of a Union of thirty-six "Wherever it floats, over this Capitol, at the however, they have the goodness to come
