A SENSATION PLAY. A Decidedly Original Adaptation.

Those who have read Miss M. E Bradden's romance of? "The Outcasts," or who have seen the adaptation of it on the stage; and who have been troubled about the identity of Henry Dunbar, will enjoy the New York Courier's version. It is as follows:

ACT I Scene 1.—Parlor in Miss Wentworth's cottage.

Enter Miss Wentworth. Miss W.-I am a teacher of music, Enter Carter, a detective.

C.—Good morning, Miss. I want music lessons. Miss W. [in a burst of professional enthusiasm]—And you shall have them. My terms are threepence a lesson. C.—Farewell, God bless you.

Exit Carter. Miss W.—A kindly prayer.

[Enter Clement Austin.

A.—Miss Wentworth, I love you! Miss W .- And I love you. Let us

[They coo. coo. A.—You will marry me?

Miss W.—Undoubtedly. But I have a disreputable old vagabond of a father. A.—I know the old skunk.

Miss W.—Then together we will watch over-the old reprobate, and make his life a happy one. A., [with forced enthusiasm].—Oh, certainly.

Scene 2.—Sitting-room of "The George," at Winchester. Waiter discovered laying the cloth for two. Waiter.—This is a private room. Ha, Exit Waiter. M.—This is the room prepared for Henry Dunbar. Good. I will try and get some money out of him. He has just returned from India, and having surmounted no end of geographical difficulties, has this day landed at Winchester. Enter Carter. Handcuffs him. C.—Ha, ha, Major, caught at last!

M.—What am I wanted for? C.—Burglary in Cornhill.

M.—I didn't do it. [Exeunt Major and Carter. Enter Henry Dunbar—that is, he isn't Henry Dunbar but his clerk Wilson, who has murdered—but wait a bit you'll see. He is preceded by two waiters bearing candelabra, walking backwards, and bowing, as practised in all the best English hotels. D.—Here at last!

W.—Dinner is ready. D.—But my friend has not yet come. I will wait for him.
You see, his friend is really Henry Dunbar, while this fellow is only-but wait a bit, you'll see.] W.-Ha! I see a crowd bringing some thing covered with a white sheet. D.—[who has murdered the real—but you'll see].—Ha! agony!

Enter a crowd bearing a soft pillow, covered with a sheet. D.-'Tishe! 'Tis my murdered friend Wilson. [You see, Dunbar-that is, not Dunbar, but the fellow who pretends to be Dunbar-but wait a bit, you'll see.] ACT II.—Scene I.—Drawing-room in Portland Place. Enter Arthur Loyell and Laura Dun-Arthur.—I love you!

Laura,-My own Arthur! Fondles him. Enter Henry Dunbar.

Dunbar.—Ha! You love her? A.-I do. She is wealthy and I am miserably poor, so no one can say my love is not disinterested. D.-Take her. Here is a check for fifteen millions. It will assist you in furnishing a home fit for the daughter of Henry Dunbar. [You see she isn't his daughter, for he is really Wilson, and not -but wait a bit, you'll see.]... A.—This is indeed kind!

[Exeunt Arthur, Dunbar and Laura. Enter Margaret Wentworth, and Footman. Miss W.-Footman, say I am Margaret Wentworth, music mistress to Miss Dunbar. [Exit Footman.] At last I shall see the monster who—but Enter Laura. L.—My own music mistress!

[Embraces her.

Miss W. Yes, Laura! I want to see your father. He owes me much. L.—I will tell him. As it is necessary to the progress of the piece, that he and should have an explanatory scene, please step inio my boudoir. Miss W.-Bless your prudent fore-

Exit Miss W. Enter Henry Dunbar, that is, of course he isn't—but you'll see. D.—Who is Miss Wentworth? L.—It is my dear music mistress. She wants to see you. She says you owe her much. D-I cannot see her. Give her this check, for five hundred thousand pounds. Tell her she shall have one every quarter.

[Exit Henry Dunbar.

L. [calling]—My music mistress. Enter Miss Wentworth. L.-Papa sends you this cheque, with his compliments. It is for five hundred thousand pounds. Miss W.-I would-rather starve and beg from door to door. Adieu.

[Exeunt Laura and Miss Wentworth at opposite entrances.
Irish Spectator.—Bedad, but they've left the nice little cheque on the flure, and it's the sarvints that'll be having a ginteel fiare-up wid it. Scene 3.—The bank parlur. Enter Henry Dunbar and Baldersby, his junior partner.

D.—So my account is in a satisfactory condition? B. Yes, I will call Mr. Austin, the [Calls for Austin. Enter Mr. Austin, with ledger. D.—How is my account? A.—Quite well, thank you, sir. Twenty-seven millions is the amount of your loose cash. D. Good. Here is a chequefor twenty thousand for yourself. A.-Thanks. I am going to marry Miss Wentworth, but you don't know

D.—Ha! Then I make you manager of our Indian branch, with a salary of ten millions a year. A.—Thanks.—I will tell Margaret. She is in the bank. Exit. D.—Ha! in the bank! Then I will escape by the back way. Escape. You see-but wait a bit. ACT III.—Scene 1.—Drawing-room in Maudslay Abbey, Dunbar's Country

Enter Dunbar. D.-Oh, remorse!

Enter the Major. M.—Ah! you murdered Henr Dunbar! () () () () () () Henry M.—Yes. Give me seventy-five thousand pounds, and I'll not mention

D.-Certainly. Here is a cheque for the exact amount. M.-Thank you. Good day. fExit Major D.-Oh, Remorse! Also Grief! Would that I could sleep!

Enter Miss Wentworth.

Miss W.—Ah! Here he is at last!
[Hits him on the back.] Murderer of of my father, Awake! Dunbar.—Ha! Margaret! At last!

Miss. W. [In one breath]. What do I see? Father! [in one breath]. Then you are not Henry Dunbar, but having murdered Henry Dunbar you dressed in his clothes and assumed his name, and he was unknown in England, having lived in India all his life, the cheat was not discovered! [You see? D.—Not so.—I did not murder him! I only killed him.

Miss W.—Then you are once more my own dear father! [Embrace. ACT IV.
Scene 1.—The same. Enter Miss Far-

Dunbar's servant. Miss F. [walking like a pigeon.] Master's bin a half-killed in a railway hacksidinct.

[Exit Miss Farren. Enter Dunbar with all his bones broken. D.—Now to mount a horse and escape the hounds of justice. Mounts a horse and escapes the hounds

Enter Carter, Austin and Miss Farrand. Carter.—Where is Mr. Dunbar. Miss F.-Well, he's-bin and-got off -hoff is-bed and-dis-peared! C.—Foiled! but we will have him yet! Scene II.—Library in Woodbine Cottage. Enter the Major in a false beard. Major.—Ha! hem! Dunbar is hidden here and his pursuers are after him. Enter Carter, Austin and Miss Wentworth, the later disguised in a comic wig and dustpan.

Miss W.—Hey—Master Dunbar baint here—he be coom this maarnin', and he be gaain off in that theere direction. C. [simple dupe!]—Good—I will after him! [He afters him. Miss W. [taking off wig.]—Gone at him!

A.—Margaret!
Miss W.—What a fellow you were to split on papa! A.-But I didn't know he was your papa?

Enter Dunbar. D.-I am about to die, and if our friends in front will only look kindly on my efforts, there will not be a happier old dog in England than Henry Dunbar! [Dies in great agony. CURTAIN.

Journey of Forty Miles on Floating Ice in the Mississippl.

[From the St. Louis Democrat, 23.] At three o'clock on Saturday afternoon, Captain Dressler, commanding one of the ferryboats lying at the Illinois shore, heard the shouts of a man near the middle of the river, floating down on a cake of ice. Without loss of time Captain D. ordered the boat to shove off, and although the ice was almost impassable, he succeeded in reaching the distressed stranger, and rescuing him from his perilous situation. The man was nearly exhausted from hunger and cold. and his face, hands, legs and feet were so badly frost-bitten that he was unable to walk. He was brought to this shore on the ferry-boat, and sent in a carriage to the office of the Board of Health, where Drs. Stark and Grissom administered restoratives and sent him to the

The man rescued was Daniel Collins, of Jersey county, Illinois. He stated that at three o'clock on Friday afternoon he started from his home for Grafton, three miles distant, on the opposite shore, and near the mouth of he Illinois river. Before reaching his lestination, his skiff ran upon a large cake of ice; he broke both his oars in attempting to extricate his boat, and he was left wedged in the floating ice, and he was left at the mercy of the waves and the grinding masses of ice. In this condition he remained all night, suffering intensely from constant apprehensions of being crushed to death, and from the intense cold which prevailed. At one time he became so much exhausted that he laid down in the bottom of his skiff, but aroused himself on coming in sight of St. Louis, and attracted the attention of Captain Dressly by crying for help at the top of his voice. Although badly frosthis voice. Although badly frost-bitten, Collins will recover with good treatment. COTTON STEALING.—We would not like to own a cargo of cotton to be shipped from Mobile, if the subjoined paragraph from the Tribune, of that city, is "founded on fact." The Tribune says: Cotton seems to be universally as tempting as "The fruit of that forbidden tree Whose mortal taste brought death into the world, And all our wo." It were an interesting chapter, illustrating the night side of human nature, that would describe accurately all the shifts and devices that have been used to get nefarious possession of the staple. It would have for its text the white gentleman—so-called and the little nigger, now classed among the freedmen. All the intermediates of these extremes would have a place in the picture. Why, we are well assured that cotton bales have been carried off from the wharves of this city at midday, whilst there were guards of various kinds over them! Nay, more, the thieves have come up through the wharves at midday, and taken illegal possession of the "fleecy wool," as Brainard called it. Isn't 'this very mysterious—that bales of cotton should walk off on a clear day from under the very noses of those who were set to watch them? There must be something of spiritualism in this marvelous and new-discovered quality of cotton. It actually can walk, if we may believe the statements of some of our vigilant watchmen. As in some other mysteries-such as squaring the circle-we have no mental method of coming to any conclu-
