NEW PUBLICATIONS.
"Mind in Nature or the Origin of Life and the Mode of Development of Animals" by Henry James Clarke, Adjunct Professor of Zoology in Harvard University, is a most attractive volume from the press of Appleton & Co., N. Y. It comprises the substance of a course of public lectures which were delivered by the author in the hall of the Lowell Institute in Boston, somewhat altered in the sequence of the subjects, and augmented by copious notes giving the results of the author's original observations, as well as extracts from other authorities.

In the limited space of this notice, it is impossible for us to give more than an outline of the scope and character of this interesting and instructive book; and in doing so, we prefer as journalists to notice it from a popular rather than a scientific point of view; leaving it for others, interested in the questions raised by the author, to discuss its claims to rank as an authority, simply saying in this connection that many of its assertions we think must be subjected to the test of further examination.

The book is divided into three parts, the first of which treats of the Origin of Life, and opens, in Chap. I, with a statement of The Theory of Development from Physical laws, such as electricity, magnetism, chemical affinity, &c., showing that this theory insidiously leads to materialism. "Many," says our author, "meet the difficulty through their belief in the revelation of the existence of a God, but then there is still a great body of readers and thinkers, inquiring minds, who would like to know more about the manner in which the Creator manifests Himself. What did the King of Israel mean, they ask, when he said, 'The Heavens declare the Glory of God, and the firmament sheweth his handiwork?'"

In answering this, Professor Clarke proceeds with an argument to prove "that there is a power at work in the Universe which possesses foreknowledge; the design of a forecasting, foreordaining mind, a thinking, intelligent, animate being; such a combination of powers that no form of physical law could possibly be conceived to represent." (pp. 4 and 5).

The chapter terminates with an account of the interesting experiments of Professor Wyman, on Spontaneous Generation; deductions in favor of which theory are presented in the second chapter, after which the "Egg State" is compared with that of the Amoeba, Difflugia, &c., beings of the lowest and most simple form, and then with the lowest forms of adult life. Next is considered the relation of the Egg to "secondary causes," and our author conducts us through a world of waters, so far as population is concerned, and fastens our eyes with the wonderful revelations of his microscope, bringing to our view facts more wonderful than the fictions of Mythology.

We see the fresh water Hydra, whose progeny first appear like the bud of a plant, and which finally, after branching out in imitation of its parent, cuts itself loose to take its turn at budding; also the Sea Anemone, or exquisite so-called "animal flower," multiplying itself in a numerous offspring blooming at its base; and we read with wonder, as we did our fairy tales, how a certain sea worm, called Mytilus, divides itself into several parts, each of which has a separate vital existence; and at page 59 is a most graphic account of the tortures of the Hydras, one of which was put inside of the other: another turned wrong side out; another cut across intermediate rings; another sliced longitudinally; others cut into pieces, and in each the little creatures soon righted themselves, or their mutilated bodies supplied the missing parts.

We would like to linger here and revel in the little world that is revealed in a drop of water, where our author seems as much at home as if he had lived there always; but he takes us "from nature up to nature's God," and asks (page 103) "Shall we fall then to recognize that Creator, who works by a method which we can see and understand as a higher order of being, less than one who works in ways mysterious to us all?" Then follows the proposition that it he creates by an egg system, as by a budding process, or by fissile generation, or in the case of the worm above cited, he may also create by Spontaneous Generation—its theory, "as a fact, has nothing to do with how it is brought about; but simply does it occur?"

But we have yielded too long to the interest of the first book, and regret to be obliged to pass over the second so hurriedly.
After drawing the distinction between animals and plants, and reviewing the plant-like Infusoria, and their relation to undoubted animals, all of which will apply repey personal, Prof. Clarke devotes a chapter to each of the five grand divisions, viz: the Protozoa, Zoophyta, Mollusca, Articulata, and Vertebrata—each of which, in opposition to many naturalists, he considers an entirely distinct division, although (chapter xv) there are imitative forms of diverse types of animals, in consequence of which animals belonging to one division may, under certain conditions, be mistaken for those belonging to another.

The last chapter, comprising the third part, is an excellent presentation of the subject of the Embryology of the five grand divisions of Natural History, and we think may be read with interest by almost any one.

We lay aside the book wishing only, as we had been led by the Professor to anticipate, that it might be in a more popular form. We think it is too generally the case, that scientific writers fail to promulgate science by aiming to interest the ignorant, and at the same time to bring out something original for their confederates. It is just here that the subject of this notice disappoints us.
In spite of this, however, no one at all interested in the study of Natural History, or familiar with the microscope, could fail to enjoy this book, while its original contributions to science will insure its being sought for by our Savans.

Messrs. Appleton have fully sustained their reputation in this publication. It is richly embellished with upwards of two hundred drawings, both original and selected, in which, for the most part, the figures are exceedingly well portrayed; these add greatly to the appearance and interest, as well as to the value of the book.

Miss Muloch's fame is so thoroughly established, that the mere announcement of a new work from her pen, is sufficient to secure a host of readers. Harper & Brothers have just published her new novel, "A Noble Life." It is a touching Scotch story, founded, we judge, upon fact. The hero of the book is a poor deformed and crippled boy, left an orphan at his birth, and the heir of an ancient title and a large estate dwarfed and mis-shapen body proves to be the cast of a noble soul and a clear and lofty mind; and his lonely life is devoted to the welfare of his adherents, and the improvement of his broad estates.
The one light of his life centres in the minister's daughter, who grows up beside him as his companion, his counsellor, his familiar friend. Helen Cardross is a beautiful character, and her devotion to the "wee Earl" is touchingly drawn. He secretly resolves, in the absence of any lineal heirs, to make her his heiress. This resolve is suspected by a distant cousin, a worthless adventurer, who ingratiates himself with the Earl and with Helen, and at last, during the Earl's absence from home, persuades her, by a feigned message from her friend, to marry and go off with him. She returns to the neighborhood, after a year's absence, with a dying husband and a new-born son, and her noble friend closes the miserable adventurer's eyes, and then re-instates her and her son in her old home. We will not trace out the conclusion of the touching story. Helen's son, with a noble character, modeled by the hand of the man who had always loved his mother, though he had been a neighboring and a new-born son, and his noble friend closes the miserable adventurer's eyes, and then re-instates her
