EVENING BULLETIN.

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 20, 1866.

THE VETO.

The President has read the Freedmen's Bureau bill. His reasons are given in the message which we print in full to-day. We need not say that we regret that he has made an issue with Congress on a measure which, after very mature consideration, had passed both Houses of Congress by very large majorities.

With all respect for the Presidential office and the President's right to express his opinions, we cannot forget that Congress is the direct representative of the people, and that its measures, adopted after careful consideration, have an equal right to our respect. We shall deplore the present difference between the President and Congress, if it should lead to a permanent breach between them, not for partisan reasons, but because it will prolong the difficulties of the country, retard reconstruction, and encourage the hostile feeling of the Southern people towards the North and the authority of the legislative department of the government.

TAXATION.

It is now a well understood fact that our system of taxation is a bad one. In the first place, the inquisitorial nature of the income tax is felt to be intolerable, and right-minded persons are put to great labor to ascertain what their returns should be. Next, we have many taxes that cost too much to collect in proportion to their amount; and again there are many petty and vexatious taxes that cause annoyance out of all proportion to their product.

All this is contrary to all the science of taxation. It is computed that we ought to raise about $200,000,000 of internal revenue, and there is no reason why at least three-fourths of this, if indeed not the whole, should not be derived from excises upon cotton, spirits and tobacco. The excise on cotton is collected alike on that which is exported, as on that which is consumed at home; a most important consideration now that it is proved that we have, practically speaking, the monopoly of cotton-raising.

Tobacco, too, does not yet pay what it ought. The South says and will pay but little in any other way than by excise on its agricultural productions, and it is in this way that its principal contributions to revenue must be made.

"CASUALS" AND "LOGGERS."

A reporter for the Pall Mall Gazette, of London, is enjoying a very wide circulation for a literary production of his own, which was gotten up under circumstances of a peculiar character, and which, should the article have ten times the circulation, it will produce none too great a reward, in the way of celebrity, for the writer, when the heavy price which he paid for his opportunity is taken into consideration. This reporter had heard and stories of the kind of accommodations furnished to temporary lodgers (or "casuals," as they are called in England), as they are called in the Metropolis. He determined to see and judge for himself, and in order to see things as they really were, he doffed his ordinary attire, and clothed himself in the rags of a street beggar, he spent a night in a workhouse. He afterwards gave to the world a very graphic description of what he saw and suffered. The night was cold and the regular lodging wards being full, a make-shift for the last comers was made by putting some of them in a shed, which was not securely enclosed, and into which the cold air penetrated. Our ragged reporter was stripped of his clothing to keep his fellow "casuals" from appropriating it, and he obtained a receipt for it in the shape of a ticket. He was furnished with a no- over cleanly bath, a rug to wrap himself in, a straw pallet upon which to stretch his limbs, and a portion of bread off which to make his supper. The shed was dirty, the bedding not satisfactory, the company of the most unpleasant de- scription, and so between obscenity, profanity and downright brute ruffian-ism, the adventurous reporter seems to have had a rather disagreeable night of it.

Except that we call our unfortunate "loggers," instead of "casuals," and their temporary lodging places station houses, in- stead of "Unions," it is not necessary to cross the ocean, or even to go outside of Philadelphia, to witness just such scenes of abject wretchedness as those described. We said just such scenes; but unless the accommodations for station house lodgers have been greatly improved within a few years, worse experience than that of the Lon- don reporter might be had within the shadow of the Hall of Independence. A few years since the writer of this article, then an active reporter, paid several night visits to the lodging apartments of the Central Station, at the corner of Fifth and Chestnut streets, not to spend a night in them, for the boon of win- ning a celebrity equal to that of Dickens himself, would not have been a sufficient temptation to go through such an experience as that. We saw enough of them however, to excite our horror and indignation, and in several articles prepared upon the subject we described the wretched dens, and appealed to the proper authorities to make a reform. If such a reform has ever been made we are ignorant of the fact. It seems that the London "casual" has bread given him when he seeks shelter for the night; the Philadelphia station-house lodger goes supperless to bed; the London "casual" is furnished with a rug for a covering; the Philadel- phia lodger has no covering except such as he wears upon his person; the "casual" has a straw bed given him to lie on, a poor bed to be sure, but still something to shield his bones from the
