Railway Accidents and Verdicts in England

The number of railway disasters in England, last year, was greater than usual, and many heavy verdicts were given in favor of persons who received severe injuries. The Southwestern Railway Company were "cast" in very heavy damages in several cases, especially those arising out of the Staplehurst accident. In one of these - for the loss of a husband, leaving two children - the damages were $7,000 - $35,000 - $24,000 for the widow and $1,000 for each of the children. In four other of these Staplehurst cases the verdicts were for personal injuries, £3,500, £2,000, £1,500 and £500, making altogether £14,500. Other claims for losses by death and personal injuries caused by this terrible accident were compromised by payment of some very large sums, varying in amount, but making a total, with the sums recovered by the verdicts above mentioned, of about £50,000.

The Northwestern Company were defendants in eight actions which were brought to trial. In one a verdict was given for the company; in another, the plaintiff was nonsuited. In the six others verdicts were found in favor of the company, £200 and £300, also £100 for the loss of a wife. Against the Great Northern there were three actions for personal injuries, in one of which the damages awarded were £4,720; in the other two, £500 and £175 were given. The London and York Railway Company had nine actions against them for personal injuries. The verdicts were respectively for £300, £1,250, £1,200, £700, £200, £200, £180, $150 and $170.

Pittsburgh Monitor. What may be regarded as Pittsburgh's most ambitious and likely to become most famous efforts in the ship-building of business, left the city in a completed state for Cairo and the Mississippi, yesterday. These were the light draught monitors Sandusky and Marietta, which were ordered before the termination of the war, and will now serve to illustrate what we could have done to aid in the defense of the great rivers if peace had not fortunately rendered the proof unnecessary. Both vessels were built in the most scientific and substantial manner, and reflect the highest credit on the resources of the establishment. Messrs. Tomlinson, Lenoir, and others were constructed. There were several sister monitors, which were intended for shallow waters, and only draw from five to eight feet. They would have been efficient auxiliaries in keeping the Mississippi and its tributaries clear of batteries and gunboats, had they been finished before the quelling of the rebellion. The Umvua, a light draught monitor also, but of different model in some particulars from the Sandusky and Marietta, yet remains at the wharf on the Allegheny river, at the foot of Pitt street, receiving her finishing touches. The only matter to be decided now is what will be done with the impregnable little monsters now that they are ready for service. Unless we have a war with France in Mexico, they can be of no practical use whatever.
