Mons. A. Legoyt, the head of the General Statistical Department of France, and Secretary of the Statistical Society of Paris, has recently concluded researches concerning "Accidents in Europe and the United States." The first questions with which the French statistician has busied himself are first, the ratio of accidents to the population; second, their ratio to the gen mortality of each sex: and third, their ratio as regards the female population, the male standard being taken at one hundred—in the different countries which enter into the comparison here.

The proportion of fatal accidents to the population varies between the maxima of , 679, and 575 to a million of inhabitants 682, 679, and 575 to a minion of initiations. England, Norway, and the United States, and the co-efficient minima of 201, 202, and 232 of Russia, Spain and Denmark. It is evident from such variable proportions that the determining causes of fatal accidents must be of very complex nature, and can-not be explained simply by what may be called the economic character of different countries. In fact, if the predominance of manufacturing and mining industries justi-fles the exceptional rate of fatal accidents in England, and to a certain extent in the United States, it surely cannot do so as regards Norway, the duchy of Oldenburg, and

M. Legoyt has been able to compare only a small number of countries, when the immediate causes or nature of accidents are considered. With the exception of England, where contusions and injuries (classified under "crushing and bruising"), and of the United States, where burns and scalds occupy the first place amongst accidents, "submersion" is the cause of the greatest number of deaths. Next come falls from an elevation; then burns, crushings and asphyxia. Among the Scandinavian counries the large number of "congelations' is not to be wondered at; but there must evidently be some error as regards Spain in this particular. So, also, while we are not surprised to find "alcoholic excesses" play an important part in Russia and Sweden, we are struck by their insignificance in England, Denmark and the United States; some fallacy, we suspect, likewise lurks here. It is with respect to "burns" that the ratio of fatal accidents rises higher amongst women than amongst men.

M. Legoyt's researches tend to show that accidental deaths nearly everywhere increase more rapidly than does the population. In France for example, the following successive and increasing ratio has taken place: 15 fatal accidents to 100,000 inhabitants from 1827 to 1830; 16 ditto from 1831 to 1835; 19 ditto from 1836 to 1840; 22 ditto from 1831 to 1835; 19 ditto from 1836 to 1840; 22 ditto from 1831 to 1845; 1945 to 1845 1841 to 1845; 24 ditto from 1846 to 1850; 25 ditto from 1851 to 1855; and 28 ditto from

No doubt some of this increase is due to the more exact character of recent enumerations; still, the continuously progressive rate which is here seen indicates a sure though lamentable onward movement. Children appear to constitute a high proportion of the victims of fatal accidents. Bayaria the latter form a very large part of the causes of mortality of childhood and adolescence, from birth to twenty years of age, and within this range the maximum is attained between the time of birth and five years. Submersion is the more frequent cause—particularly as regards male children-of the fatal event. Burns and poisoning are frequent in tender years; but, strangely enough, children are less frequently victims in towns than in country

The ratio of females to males as regards accidents tends to increase, probably with the participation of the former in industrial occupations. In Bavaria and Saxony the ratio is highest during early infancy, and in the former state lowest between forty and fifty years of age. At every age it attains its maximum through "burns, which in Ba varia are more common during summer than in winter. Women more frequently succumb to burns, suffocation by fire, submersion and poisoning. Fatal accidents are of much more frequent occurrence in sumer than during the other three seasons the year. This is due, probably, to the fact of the former season being the chief one for outdoor operations, navigation, etc. It is a fair presumption, also, that the smaller number met with in towns as compared with country districts is due to the greater vigilance of authority, and the more exact surveillance of parents, generally put in force in towns. London, Berlin and Stock-holm illustrate this conclusion very nota-From 1852 to 1854 Paris likewise was in the same category; but from 1855 to 1861 it occupied the opposite position.
