[] LELOSE OF SATURDAY'S PROCEEDINGS.]

House,-Mr. Moulton (Ill.) addressed the House discussing the question of reconstruction, arguing that public faith and security required, first, that the government shall be absolutely protected from the repetition of secession and rebellion by providing for the punishment of treason; second, that the freedmenshall be secured an absolute equal ity with the white men before the law, and shall be endowed with every political right necessary to maintain that equality; third, that representation in Congress shall be founded on and in proportion to numbers entitled to suffrage; fourth; that the rebel debt shall be absolutely repudiated; and fifth, that civil rights shall be guaranteed to all, with the means to enforce them. He held that these rights and conditions should be severed by proper a mendments to the be secured by proper amendments to the Constitution, and that now was the time to inaugurate these amendments.

In relation to the President, he said that until recently he had had the confidence of the Union party, and that no honorable man could have believed that he would desert the party which had defended him against the assaults of traitors and elected him to the position he held. Ingratitude has been ever regarded as a crime of the most damning character. Yet, in his opinion Andrew. Johnson would go down to posterity not only as the betrayer of his party, but as an ingrate, famous in all time to come, to all honorable men. All the instincts of Andy Johnson, he said, were intensely Southern e hated Northern men as intensely as did Davis or Toombs. Beauregard or Lee "This the Southern people knew, and hence their confidence in Johnson. In his (Mr. Moulton's) opinion it was, to say the least, unfortunate that any man with intense Southern feelings and instincts, should at this time be at the head of this government. The pernicious consequences of it might require the work of ages to correct and overcome. Myers (Pa.) next addressed the House, taking strong grounds against the President's policy of reconstruction. He held that none of the rebellious States should be admitted to representation until it had conformed by its constitution and laws to the change in political relations brought about by the war. As to the suggestion that districts in States should be admitted to representation, he showed how absurd that was, because it is the State that sends Senators to Congress, and is the State to which a republican form of government must be guaranteed. He hoped the time was near when that guarantee and recognition should be given to Tennessee. The other rebel States, he showed, had no right to complain of delay; but even as to them. he would look upon it as a proud day when their rehabilitation would be complete. Slavery being dead, it was the duty of Congress to alter the representation based upon it. He would not demand of the South a policy which his own State had not adopted; but he would ask from North and South that a population excluded from voting should not avail in any State for the purposes of representation. Mr. Buckland (Ohio) next addressed the House. He said that the people were becoming very impatient at the delay in reconstruction, and did not understand why Congress had not adopted some definite plan. He held that a people of a State, finding themselves from any cause without a government, might organize a government and exercise its functions without the the assent of Congress; but he did not think that representation should be admitted Tennessee or any of the rebel States without the concurrent or joint acceptation of both branches of Congress. He deprecated the warfare waged against the President by the people. He did not believe that Mr. Johnson was about to prove recreant to the great trust reposed in him, and they would stand by him regardless of attacks from any quarter. He disapproved of the assaults made upon the President, and thought they were uncalled for and out of place. He did not follow the Chairman of the Reconstruction Committee (Mr. Stevens) on that part of his plan of reconstructing the rebellious States. It seemed to him as if it was the policy to get up a bad state of feeling between the President and Congress, and to destroy the confidence of loyal people in the President. He would not be a party to any such warfare. If he were ure that the rights of loyal, whites and of freedmen would be respected and protected by the Southern people, he would vote to-day to restore those States to their practical relations with the government, without requiring more than a single amendment to the Constitution, and that would be on the subject of apportioning representation. His own opinion was that representation should be founded solely upon voters. He was very anxious that measures should be devised that would satisfy the people both South and North, so that they might again meet together in cordial friendship on terms of perfect equality and with muttal wastest. of perfect equality and with mutual respect; and he hoped that before this Congress adjourned such measures would be adopted.

Mr. Hart (N. Y.) next addressed the House on the same question of reconstruc-tion, taking the ground that the people of the South were not in a condition to be intrusted with full powers in the government. In support of that position he quoted extensively from the testimony taken before the Reconstruction Committee. If the Government were to let traitors go unwhipped of justice, at least they should be held back from coming so near as to endanger the future peace of the country. The Southern States were lapsing into a condition of anarchy. Humanity, justice, and the honor of the country demanded that the Government in those States should be established at once on sure foundations. They had seen the utter failure of intrusting to the people of the rebel States themselves the establish ment of such governments as would afford irreversible guarantees for the future. It was notorious that if the military forces were withdrawn, the rebel States would be in rebellion in thirty days thereafer.

What course, he asked, should be pursued to bring these people back on a platform of justice? He knew of but one way by which these States should he restored, and that was to recognize them as entitled to reprewas to recognize them as entitled to representation only when a majority of the population of each State were willing and able to maintain a loyal government, and to afford these guarantees which eternal justice should ever demand. He advocated the extension of suffrage to the freedmen of the South, saying that it was monstrous that four millious of people, who had been made free and independent, should be deprived of the right to vote for no better reason than the color of their skins; and he contended that no more humane course could be that no more humane course could be adopted than to enfranchise the freedmen and thereby strengthen the loyal white men of the South, in order to create an irreversible guarantee for the future peace and safety of the nation.

Mr. Lawrence (Ohio) spoke at length on the constitutional amendment prohibiting Congress or the States from making payments on the act for the emancipation of slaves. The Judiciary Committee has reported that exception should be allowed, so that companyation may be made for slaves. ported that exception should be allowed, so that compensation may be made for slaves enlisted in the army under the act of Congress, of February 24, 1864, and for slaves enlisted under certain laws of Maryland. There was now in the United States Treasury, as a part of the commutation fund, a little over nine millions of dollars applicable to payment for slaves enlisted. As this was provided for by law, and as the amount was small, it was not proposed, he said, to disturb that. He then proceeded to argue in favor of the general amendment to the Constitution. stitution. Slaves were not property at com-nion law, and no one of the States which in cur past history abolished slavery ever made compensation for them. There was now no obligation on the government to make compensation for the slaves emandpated. Our national debt was now nearly three thousand millions of dollars, and i would require us to increase that debt twelve hundred millions of dollars to pay for the slaves. If we would avoid repudia-tion we must forever prohibit the possibility of this. It was important that the question should be finally settled. He exhibited a should be inally settled. He exhibited a statistical tal-le, showing that it would require one-sixth of all the taxable property of all the slave States to pay for the slaves. If we did not prohibit this, the Northern Democracy would unite with the South in the scheme of making payment. He read extracts from the message of the so-called Governor Orr, of South Carolina, and from General Schurz's report, to show that the South were now making the demand. The Virginia Legislature had recently proposed to take an inventory of all the slaves of the State, with a view to payment. Let us, he said, forever close this question, or it will rise up to create alarm among the creditors of the nation. If we do not make amend ments now, they will not be made when rebel representatives fill these halls. The people demanded constitutional amendments changing the basis of representation, prohibiting the payment of the rebel debt, and prohibiting payment for emancipated slaves.

At the close of Mr. Lawrence's remarks,
Mr. Wentworth (Ill.) asked whether any preparation were being made to dress' the hall in mourning on account of the fall in gold to 125. [Laughter.] Mr. Ashley (Ohio) said he did not believe here were. Mr. Wentworth said—Although I am my-elf delighted with the fall of gold, yet if the opponents of the policy wish to do any-hing of the kind I will not object.

[Laughter.]
Mr. Lawrence (Ohio) would like to inquire at the same time whether anything was being done to reduce taxes. Had these fallen as gold had?

Mr. Wentworth replied that the few remaining soldiers and widows of the war of the Revolution and of the war of 1812, as well as members of Congress, the employes of the House, and laboring people generally, would probably have the chance in a few days to rejoice that the credit of this great government was restored. God bless the soldiers. [Laughter.]
