EVENING BULLETIN. THURSDAY, APRIL 5, 1866.

SENATOR TRUMBULL'S SPEECH. The speech delivered by Senator Trumbull, yesterday, on the President's veto of the Civil Rights bill, is one of the most remarkable arguments which has been made upon any question during the present session. The last veto message has been universally felt to be far inferior to its predecessor in the strength of its objection to the bill, but it needed to be cast into some such crucible as the clear brain of the Senator of Illinois has prepared for it, before the mass of the people could clearly understand its utter worthlessness. Whatever of specious logic there may have appeared to be embodied in its oracular utterances. evaporates under the white heat of Mr. Trumbull's exhaustive argument, and the President is left stripped of every Constitutional pretext and convicted out of his own mouth of the most palpable inconsistency. The array of authorities by which Mr. Trumbull demolishes Mr. Johnson's declarations upon the subject of American citizenship includes such men as Chief Justice Marshall, Henry Wheaton and Chancellor Kent, the greatest expounders of American Constitutional law. But the crushing feature of the speech is the appeal from President Johnson to Senator Johnson. The attempt in the veto message to excite prejudice against the bill by asserting that it discriminates against foreigners, was felt to be, at the time of its delivery, a very weak and shallow device, but we presume that comparatively few persons were aware of the weapon which the President was forging for his own destruction. With annihilating effect, Senator Trumbull turns to Andrew Johnson's famous speech on the veto of the Homestead Bill in 1860, and quotes his own strangely appropriate words, to rebuke this unworthy appeal to the foreign element of the country. It appears that Mr. Buchanan, in the veto of the Homestead Bill, resorted to the same means as those now adopted by Mr. Johnson, and Mr. Trumbull does the country a good service in reminding us of the then Senator Johnson's withering reply: He said "this idea about poor foreigners some how or other appears to haunt the imsome how or other appears to haunt the im-agination of a great many. I am constrained to say that I look upon this objection of the bill as a mere quibble on the part of the President, and as being hard pressed for some excuse in withholding his approval of the measure. His allusion to the foreigners in this connection looks to me more like the ad contantandom of the mean reliations of the ad captandum of the mere politician or demagogue, than a grave and sound reason to be offered by the President of the United States in a veto message upon so important a measure as the homestead bill." But damaging as this reminiscence of the President's former views is, it does not stand alone. In the very same speech he took the bold ground that a course such as he is now pursuing is not only in the highest degree presumptuous, but is in absolute violation of the spirit, if not the letter of the Constitution. Senator Johnson argued, with undeniable force, that the purpose of the veto power was to control legislation that might be passed by a small majority in Congress, but that where more than two-thirds of that body voted for a measure the President had no right to interfere. These were his words:
