THE DEERING MASSACRE.

The community is appalled, to-day, with the news of a frightful tragedy which has no parallel in the criminal records of Philadelphia. A whole family, father, mother, children and another relative beside, are found brutally butchered, under circumstances of the most curdling horror. It is difficult, even with all the sickening details before us, to realize that a monster, capable of such a deed, can exist in a civilized community. The evidence thus far obtained indicates that this wholesale massacre had no better motive than that of mere plunder, which is so sure to betray

The mind staggers in the effort to conceive the depth of savage depravity which must be reached before so fiendish a deed can be consummated, and we leave the terrible topic, with the earnest hope that the efforts of the officers of justice for the arrest of the murderer may speedily be crowned with success.

NEW POSTAL ABRANGEMENT.

this ingenious expedient the action of travel, is evaded in the case of this one zens of Indiana, may fairly be taken as embodying the sentiments of Congress upon the all-absorbing subject of reconstruction. Compared with some of the popular addresses made upon similar occasions, which have become unhappily familiar to us of late, Mr. Colfax's remarks are as significant as they are dignified and eloquent. Free from all attempts at mere clap-trap effect, all flights of hollow rhetoric and all appeals to the passions and prejudices of men, he gives the country a tangible clue to the past and present attitude of Congress. Mr. Colfax meets the oft-repeated charge that Congress "has done nothing," by pointing out how much it has done and is doing. He shows that the President, instead of assembling Congress a year ago and acting concurrently with it. spent eight months in developing his own policy, which has as yet produced so little substantial fruit. He indicates, step by step, the measures by which Congress ever since 1862 has been laying down the broad foundations upon which alone the shattered fabric of the Union can be safely re-built. He condenses into a single sentence the fundamental principle of reconstruction when he says: "Loyal men shall govern a preserved Republic,"

The marked feature of Speaker Colfax's speech is the distinct avowal that Congress has planted itself, immutably, | posed to supersede the use of the lampupon Mr. Johnson's own platform. The policy of reconstruction which it has adopted is, in Mr. Colfax's words, that | additional facility to the public. How "laid down by Andrew Johnson with such emphasis and earnestness in his speeches made to the people between the | and the degree of oversight exercised by month of June, 1864, and the month of | our Postmaster. It looks, at first sight, May, 1865." The position assumed by | like avery cumbrous piece of machinery Mr. Johnson was so clearly marked that the people at large can never be deceived about it, and Mr. Colfax, echoing, as he undoubtedly does, the sentiment of the whole Union party of the country, takes ground from which neither clamor, nor sophistry, neither cajolery nor force can dislodge him. The sentiments upon the strength of which Mr. Johnson became President of the United States were so plain and simple and appealed so directly to the loyal impulses of the people, that they form to-day the cardinal articles of faith upon which Congress rests itself. Mr. Colfax has, openly proclaimed this fact, when he put these words on record:-"I endorse his sentiments, proclaimed by him in Nashville the night he was nominated Vice President, and by him in the capital the day when the news of the surrender of Lee's army was received. I endorse the sentiments uttered by him to various committees upon his entering on the Presidency. I learned those sentiments from him and cannot unlearn them now. I believed them then, and I believe them still."

street cars is a new one, and will require some time to demonstrate its usefulness. efficiency and safety. The plan adopted contemplates the conveyance of the mails, several times a day, to the sub-offices. The bags will be conveyed by hand to the line of the road at Seventh and Ninth streets, and again by hand from the nearest points of the same line to the sub-offices. In other words, instead of sending the bags by a light wagon from one office to the other, the carrier will make part of the trip on foot and part by a street car. There is an apparent gain of time by the new plan, as the same mail-wagon at present makes an extended circuit, including several sub-offices. Whether there will be the same security in the transmission of the mails may be a matter of doubt. Some of the sub-offices are quite remote even from the line of this all-comprehensive road, and in these cases the bags must of course be carried by a single carrier a distance of several squares.

The second feature of the new plan is the collection of letters from all parts of the city and their conveyance to the Central office. This is to be done by attaching iron boxes to the cars, in which letters may be placed, at any point of the line. Each car is to be stopped at the intersection of Chestnut street with Seventh and Ninth streets, the box opened and the letters removed. It is not propost boxes, which will be visited periodically as before, but to give this as an this new plan will work will depend upon the fidelity of the agents employed to effect a very simple object, and to Swayne's those who have either principles or prejudices adverse to Sunday travel, it will probably appear as a mere ruse on the part of the railway company to evade the existing laws on that vexed subject. As there are no letters delivered on Sunday the question will be raised whether it is necessary to run the cars for the whole day, on service from which the public will derive no advantage. There is a strong prejudice in the minds of the community against monopolies, and we believe that even those who are most opposed to Sunday travel would rather see all the roads in operation than to have the privilege conferred upon one, to the exclusion of all the rest.
