THE MINISTERIAL SPEECHES.

In England the cabinet ministers. when their views on public questions are desired, have the privilege of expressing them on the floor of Parliament. In this country they do it by letters or by speeches before public assemblages. Secretary Seward made his speech at Auburn, the other night, on the question of reconstruction. A serenade to the President and the other heads of departments was formally announced at Washington, and it took place last evening, the managers of it being well-known supporters of the President's policy, in opposition to the majority in Congress. The President was first called upon, but he wisely said only a few commonplace words of thanks for the compliment offered to him. Attorney General Speed wrote a note declining the honor intended for him, and refused to accede to the demand of the Johnson club for an expression of his views. Secretary Harlan also wrote a letter, declining to receive the serenading party, but candidly saying that his well-known views were unchanged, and that he stood by the principles of the Republican Union party. Postmaster General Dennison received the serenaders, and made a mild and moderate speech, expressing a hope that the breach between the President and Congress, already narrowed, would soon be entirely healed. Mr. McCulloch, the Secretary of the Treasury, spoke warmly in favor of the President's policy, and indulged in some flippant, undignified flings at Congress. Secretary Welles only said a few words, which may be construed for or against the President as readers choose.

The important speech of the evening, and the only one revealing any of the dignity of statesmanship, was that of Secretary Stanton. If any one can see from this speech that Mr. Stanton has abandoned the principles of the Republican party and joined the President in his hostility to Congress, he must have "optics sharp." While giving the President credit for good intentions and a sincere desire to restore harmony in the whole country, Mr. Stanton quotes from the annual message to Congress such passages on the subject of reconstruction as were approved by the whole country, and says they received his approval. But he is also respectful towards Congress and concedes to it the right of deciding who shall be admitted to its seats. He says he approved of the Freedmen's Bureau bill, but as it has failed to become a law, he regards subject of debate or difference of opin-come a law, without the executive sanction, has equally ceased to be a subject of debate, but it is evident that Mr. Stanton approves of it. In regard to the report of the Reconstruction Committee, he questions the expediency of the third section, but he expresses full respect for those who may differ from him. The copperheads may take what comfort they can from Mr. Stanton's speech; but if they think he is a convert to their views, they are very much mistaken.

NAPOLEON III AND THE TREATIES

OF 1815. When the great Napoleon fell, the victorious allied powers arranged the map of Europe to suit themselves, and the treaties of Vienna, which were meant to be final, have been perplexing the nations ever since, and more especially since many wars and revolutions have occurred, which those treaties were intended to make impossible. It is natural that the inheritor of the name, the ideas and the imperial throne of the great Napoleon should dislike the arrangement made over the supposed ruin of the Napoleon dynasty. The time for his revenge of what he regarded as the wrong done to his family arrived when he put on the purple, and he has been making good use of his opportunities. The treaties of 1815 were first openly violated by Napoleon III in 1859, when the Italian war occurred, and most of the petty governments of the Italian peninsula were consolidated into one, under his direction. Then, as his compensation for this service to Victor Emmanuel, Napoleon helped himself to Savoy. This was done without consulting any of the high contracting powers to the treaties that were to perpetuate the peace of Europe and give it an immutable map. When the German States interfered with the Danish Duchies. there was a new and unwarrantable alteration of the map, and out of this a war is threatening. Napoleon III, while professing a desire to keep out of this war, has slily taken occasion to utter words that have alarmed Europe into a belief that he is anxious for it to come on, and is ready to go into it as soon as it may seem to him expedient. Journeying, ostensibly on a pleasure trip, through his domain, the Emperor arrived at the ancient historical little town of Auxerre in the Department of the Yonne, where, of course, he was welcomed by the authorities and made a little speech. In that little speech he uttered a sentence which precipitated the financial convulsion that was shaking London and the other moneyed centres of Europe when the last mail left. He said, in the version of the English papers:

"I am happy to see that the souvenirs of the First Empire are not effaced from your memory. Believe that on my part I have inherited the sentiments of the chief of my family for those energetic and patriotic populations which sustained the Emperor in good and also in evil fortune. I have moreover, a debt of gratitude to pay to the artment of the Yonne. It was one o the first to give me its suffrage in 1848: because its people knew, in common with the great majority of the French nation, that their interests were mine, and that I, like them, detested those treaties of 1815, which some persons would now make the sole base of our foreign policy."

The detestation meant to be expressed in the italicised words seems more intense in the original French, which is: "Je détestais autant qu'eux ces traités de 1815 dont on cherche maintetenant à faire l'unique base de notre politique étrangère." Who is, or who are, the indefinite "On." whose attempt to bind France to the treaties of 1815 is thus bitterly rejected by the Emperor? "On" is first M. Thiers, who lately made a speech to that intent in the Legislative Body, that was unanimously applauded by the Government deputies as well as the opposition. "On" is next England, Austria, Russia and all the adherents of the old balance of power doctrine. Napoleon evidently holds them and their ideas in utter scorn, and he makes the little community of Auxerre the medium through which this scorn is to be expressed to the world. The Maire and the Auxerrois in general must have been astonished to find that they had such strong convictions concerning the treaties of 1815. Many of them probably never heard of such treaties, nor knew what were their stipulations. But Napoleon was talking to the world at large, and especially to Europe, and as soon as Paris and London heard the words. there was panic, for they knew that whenever Napoleon found it safe and convenient, he would proceed to carry out all the Napoleonic ideas. The words, in fact, mean war, and such a war as Europe has not known since the first Empire. If it can be averted by any measures or any intervention, humanity will rejoics. But it seems to be on the point of breaking out in Italy and Germany, and these words of Napoleon, while they may cause Austria to hesitate, are certain to encourage Italy and Prussia to go on; for they, along with France, are likely to win territory by the conflict.

CHIVALBY. One might reasonably expect that the lessons of the last five years had taught the Southern people that they were sufferers by the attempt to struggle against the civilization of the age, and that instead of wasting their time, their wits and their energies in .pursuits better adapted to the period of the Middle Ages, than to the era of common schools, freedom, steam engines, telegraphs, fast presses and reaping machines, they would turn their attention to something practical. The Constitutional amend. ment which wiped out slavery will be it as no longer a living measure, nor the the stern teacher that will cure the Southrons of their old fantastical tastes on. The Civil Rights bill having be- and pursuits, for in the realization of the injunction to earn their bread by the sweat of their brows, they will experience the necessity for changing their habits in order to make them accord better with the altered condition of things.

That they have not done so is manifest. for they still cling to their pet idol of personal and sectional superiority, and to their ghost of chivalry, effete and absurd phantom as the latter has become. The war that ruined and almost totally exhausted Virginia had scarcely come to a close before the rattle of tin armor and the sound of crack-brained knightly phrase were heard at Fauquier Springs, and the usual twaddle of the lists was uttered by men who were scarcely less foolish than Don Quixote, and not a thousandth part as chivalrous as the hero of La Mancha; for the slackwitted knight would have scorned to do a palpable wrong to a helpless class in order that he might live off their earnings. The Okalona (Miss.) News brings us intelligence of a "tournament" that has just taken place in that part of the

"After splendid riding on the part of the Knights, 'Rob Roy,' Mr. E. M. Walker, was declared the victorious Knight. The 'Knight of the Woods,' Mr. W. C. Richardson, won the second prize; and the 'Knight of Chickasaw,' Mr. T. M. Richardson, the third. Thus sended the tournament. A bell took please is ended the tournament. A ball took place in the evening, at which 'Rob Roy,' in a few very appropriate remarks, crowned Miss Mattie Sadler 'Queen of May.' The 'Knight of the Woods,' after a beautiful and inspiring speech, placed the wreath upon the head of Miss Mattie Shearer as 'First Maid of Honor.' The 'Knight of Chickasaw' had the honor of placing the wreath upon the head of Miss Helen Brown as 'Second Maid of Honor.'"

world. It says:

Common sense would suggest that the "Knight of the Woods," the "Knight of Chickasaw" and "Rob Roy" might all have been more practically employed with spade, saw or hammer, and that "Maids of Honor" are superfluous institutions in a community that is deficient in respect to wearing apparel; but chivalry and common sense do not always pull together.

The late capital of the exploded Confederacy furnishes an example of how difficult it is for the people of that part of the country to realize that the result of the war teaches the stern lesson that they must exert themselves or suffer. The work of rebuilding the burnt district is in progress, and masons, carpenters and laborers are busily engaged in repairing the ravages of the conflagration. The mechanics employed are all Northern men or foreigners. The dressed stone, the iron castings and all other work that can be performed abroad go there in boxes from Northern shops and quarries; the capital employed is mostly from the North, and the very omnibusses in the streets loudly proclaim at once their Northern origin and the poverty of Virginia mechanica) resources; for these vehicles have been put in use without the brush having been applied to efface the old lettering that tells of "Broadway," Ferry," "Fairmount," &c.

The Southerner does not take kindly to the work-shop, the potato patch or the mill; but the Knights of Chickasaw and the Barons of Chickahominy have the stern lesson to learn that the age which has doomed the extinction of slavery has more important business on hand than tilting at muffin-rings and crowning young women Queens of Love and Beauty.

SECRETARY STANFON. The abiding faith which the loyal masses of the North were wont to repose in Abraham Lincoln fell, at his death, not so much upon his successor in office, as upon our sturdy Secretary of War. Edwin M. Stanton. There it still rests, despite the frantic efforts which the radical defenders of "my policy" have made to place him in a false position before the country. It is evident that they did not get what they bargained for, last night, in Washington. Mr. Stanton defined his position with all of his old independence and with a dignified precision, in pleasing contrast with the puerile sophistries of Mr. Seward, and the ill-tempered harangue of Mr. McCulloch. There is nothing in Mr. Stanton's speech to warrant the assertions that have been made of his opposition to Congress, or to shake the confidence which the Union party has so long felt in his integrity and uncompromising loyalty.
