himself on the banks of the Niagara, remains to be seen. Then we hear of a gathering of the clans at St. Albans, Vermont, ready for a sloop upon the shores of Canada. At Elmir, too, the "boys in green" had gathered, in force, all ready to do or die, and so anxious, in fact, to do or die that they had to fighting among themselves, and the first blood of the war that is to liberate Ireland by making a raid upon Canada, has been shed in the United States.

RENNETT & CO., TOWER HALL, 518 MARKET STREET. MAGIC PHOTOGRAPH. LITTLE DON'T LIKE 'EM. "I'm really, they make me look like a pig."

While these grand military movements are going forward, we hear of some details that are interesting. We learn, for instance, that the British regulars are to be demobilized with six-shooters, while the Canadian volunteers are to be scattered with grape, an arrangement that could be made satisfactory all around if the British Commander-in-Chief would only be obliging enough to keep the regulars and militia separated in such convenient lots as to make the Fenian arrangement available, and to prevent confusion among the ammunition boxes of the Sweeneyites.

THE FENIAN INVASION. The Fenians are on the war path; Col. O'Neill, of Nashville, with six hundred sons of Ireland, and a train of nine army wagons, has seized an old redoubt at the mouth of the Niagara river, and raised the banner of Ireland in Canada; horses have been seized, and a Canadian official has been despoiled of sixty dollars in gold. The "bould soldier boys" who run with the Sweeney machine have committed these acts of war; but with a degree of martial financial honor that would have done credit to a Cade, a Wellington or a Sherman, they have scorned to appropriate private property to their own uses without full compensation to the owners. The immortal Jack Cade hung one of his followers at Tyburn for despoiling a London burgher of his goods. Wellington would not allow his men to appropriate even an orange in his famous Peninsular campaign without its equivalent being tendered in British gold, and Sherman paid honest Yankee greenbacks for the chickens and green corn that were consumed by his troops in the celebrated march through Georgia and the Carolinas. Colonel O'Neill has started business upon the same correct principles and is imitating the illustrious examples noted above by paying for Canadian ponies and a B'ne-nose fodder with bonds of the Irish Republic, convertible into current funds at the convenience of the drawer. The Colonel has also followed the example of Cade and of Cortez, not exactly by burning his ships after landing his gallant "six hundred" upon hostile shores, but by turning adrift his transport fleet of canal boats and steam tugs. Whether he will take up a line of march into the bowels of the land, or intrench himself on the banks of the Niagara, remains to be seen. Then we hear of a gathering of the clans at St. Albans, Vermont, ready for a sloop upon the shores of Canada. At Elmir, too, the "boys in green" had gathered, in force, all ready to do or die, and so anxious, in fact, to do or die that they had to fighting among themselves, and the first blood of the war that is to liberate Ireland by making a raid upon Canada, has been shed in the United States. The business seems somewhat Hibernian in its progress and developments thus far. While these grand military movements are going forward, we hear of some details that are interesting. We learn, for instance, that the British regulars are to be demobilized with six-shooters, while the Canadian volunteers are to be scattered with grape, an arrangement that could be made satisfactory all around if the British Commander-in-Chief would only be obliging enough to keep the regulars and militia separated in such convenient lots as to make the Fenian arrangement available, and to prevent confusion among the ammunition boxes of the Sweeneyites. We have treated in a trifling manner because of its manifest absurdity. Were it not for the mischief that will grow out of it; the movement would only be calculated to excite laughter. As it is, the probabilities are that it will be attended with bloodshed, the serious destruction of property, the strengthening of the bonds of Ireland and the endangering of the amicable relations that exist between England and the United States. There must also be much fear and apprehension felt among the people of Canada; but we do not count this circumstance among the evils of the raid that we should deplore. Canada sided notoriously and indecently with the rebels during our war, and its people aided and abetted, in every possible way, the Southern scoundrels who had an asylum in the province, while they concocted steamboat burnings, the destruction of railway trains, bank robberies, hotel burnings, wholesale poisoning and the dissemination of infectious diseases. The curses have gone home to roost, and to make the retribution more complete, the invading Fenians, both officers and rank and file, are largely made up from among men who served in the Southern army during the rebellion. We wish them much joy of the unwelcome visit of their old friends and colleagues.

MR. SEWARD'S HONESTY. In Mr. Seward's flippant speech at Auburn he asked, with an air assurance worthy of Palmerston, "How could Democrats and Rebels avoid being converted?" The question is being answered by this country differently from the intention of the questioner. It is beginning to see that it will be quite impossible for the rebels long to withstand the overwhelming kindness of Mr. Seward. He has reached that point of magnanimous affection for "democrats and rebels" that leads him to neglect even his own political household in order to feed his enemies, and to strip his own children to clothe his enemies. A marked instance of Mr. Seward's benevolence has recently come to light which deserves special notice. Our readers will remember Major A. R. Calhoun, whose eloquent speeches in the last Presidential campaign contributed so largely to the success of the cause in Pennsylvania. This gallant officer served for nearly four years, and until his health was entirely broken down by wounds, sickness and long imprisonment. He carries the marks of seven honorable wounds, and the record of ten long months of languishing in the prison pens of the South. In the hope of restoring his shattered health, this brave and accomplished young officer applied to the State Department for some appointment abroad, where a more favorable climate might re-establish his strength. His application was backed by warm recommendations from a host of loyal soldiers and civilians from various parts of the country, and the President's order to the heads of departments to fill vacancies with honorably discharged soldiers gave every reason for hope that the application would be granted. The Consulate of Amoy, in China, was vacant, and Mr. Seward promised it to Major Calhoun. But just here, the benevolent Secretary's solicitude for his "democratic and rebel friends" got the better of him, and he turned his back upon the young soldier and gave the place to a pet of Mr. Cowan, a certain Mr. Denby, who has never smelled gunpowder, nor seen a battlefield, but who has enjoyed a fat office in the Navy Department at Washington. The secret of Mr. Seward's conduct in this affair is easily explained. He discovered that Major Calhoun had remained true to the principles which he so powerfully advocated in 1864 and would not desert them in favor of the Seward-Johnson policy. Whether Mr. Seward expected to establish a National Johnson Union Club in Amoy or not, we do not know, but he would certainly have showed better diplomacy, at least, by banishing Major Calhoun and his principles to China, than to leave him here to devote his remaining strength to the cause which Mr. Seward once professed to love so well.
