(Continued from the First Page.) children whom he had deprived of life. He was invariably docile after his conviction. and he never failed to cheerfully admit the justice of the fate that awaited him.

Anecdotes of Probst. We have been placed, by the same unquestioned and unquestionable authority just referred to, in possession of a number of interesting anecdotes concerning the prisoner at the time of the murder and subsequent to it that have never yet been made publie.

Greed of Gain at the bottom of the Crime. Probst expected to realize fully one thousand dollars by the robbery of Mr. Dearing. When asked if the murder was a sudden and irresistible impulse, growing out of the desire for gain, he refused to avail himself of that plea, and said no, he had determined on the murder the evening previous, and perfected his plans during the night. When asked if revenge had anything to do with the motives of the crime, he answered in the negative. The Dearings had always treated him tolerably well, and he killed them simply because he wanted to obtain the money which he thought they possessed. His Disappointment and Contemplated

Suicide. Probst says that after the butchery was completed he experienced a feeling of thorough appreciation of his crime while searching the house. He had expected to obtain a thousand dollars and he realized $17 75, four dollars of which proved to be counterfeits! The failure of the reward he had hoped for and expected, brought with it a horror of the deed he had committed. He felt a conviction that he would be discovered and hanged, and he stood for some time with Mr. Dearing's revolver poised in his hand and hesitating whether or not he should de stroy his own life. He finally determined to brave it out, and he went on with his preparations for leaving the place. He said i was when he started away from her desolate home that the full horror of his situation came over him.

Why he Killed the Baby. When it was urged upon the murderer, by our informant, that the little baby could not have harmed him or interfered with his purpose of robbery, or exposed his guilt had he suffered it to live, he replied, "It may seem absurd for a man guilty of the crimes which I have committed to say so, but I killed the babe from merciful moives! I knew that the Dearings had no visitors, and that it would probably beseveral days before the murder was discovered, and I could not bear the thought of the poor child lying screaming and famishing, so thought it best to kill it. It will be remembered that before he left the scene of the murder he gave the cattle a large supply of hay and fed the chickens. What a strange compound!

Miss Dolan's Money. When asked if he had told the truth concerning the one hundred and twenty dollars that were said to have been in Miss Dolan's pocket-book, he reasoned that he would not have been so foolish as to deny a paltry theft when he was willing to confess such terrible crime. He said that after he had killed her he took the wallet from the pocket, and found that it contained but three dollars and sixty-five cents, which he took. He saw nothing of the larger sum, and there is no doubt that he told the truth.

Remorse. Probst said that when the bloody work was completed, his horror and remorse became almost insupportable. To use his own words, he "tried to get away from him. self." He plunged into vile dissipation, as is known, and while he lived in constant expection of being arrested, he almost wished for the event. Life had become insupportable to him.

Why He Looked Stolid. When told that his sullen, stolid demeanor at the trial caused the angry feeling against him to be increased, he said, "What am I to do? If I weep, they would say I was a coward, and while I could kill women and children, I would cry when I was punished. If I was bold and defiant, they would say it was because I was brutal and hard-find fault with me for that. What am I to As an evidence of what he felt during the trial he said that when Mr. Mann was closing for the Commonwealth, and was describing the different victims of the murder, his heart was wrung with anguish. He said Judge Allison's language at the time of the sentence, affected him in the same way.

ened. If I look blank and impassive, they

"Little Mary." The "Little Mary" referred to in the letter of Probst, is his only sister, a girl of fourteen. A reference to her generally moved him to tears. He was by no means incapable of the "melting mood" on other occasions. One day a gentleman who enjoyed the confidence of the prisoner showed him a picture representing some little children on a holiday occasion. To his surprise he found Probst weeping over it. He said," Why Anton, what are you crying about?" He replied that it reminded him of the time when he too was an innocent child, exclaiming, with much warmth, "My God, if I could only bring those days back again!"

The Finale. Thus ends the history of one of the bloodiest rarimes and the greatest criminals known in our annals. The culprit has paid the penalty of his offences, the law has been vindicated, and we trust that it may belong, very long, before the world is shocked by a repetition for the offence that has rendered the name of

Anton Probst odious to all time. For the Philada. Evening Bulletin.]

The Academy of the Fine Arts. On the last page of the catalogue of each year's exhibition of the Academy considerable is said first, in reference to a "Life Class," or to speak more comprehensively, of a place where students may make drawings and sketches from the living model, specifying the hours of meeting and the various nights on which the said class assemble.

An allusion is also made to the facilities offered to those who desire to study the sublime works of antiquity. Then come mysterious hints in relation to a certain "Library of the Academy," and of the manner in which the uninitiated may procure admission to revel in the glories of this young Vatican, with a great deal more that. if implicitly accepted in an unsophisticated spirit, would lead one to suppose that the triumphs of the Louvre and the Kensington Museum were as nothing in comparison with those of the institution at 1025 Chestnut street. Now I really profess to know something in relation to these things, and after numerous visits to both "Life" and "Antique" classes, feel prepared to give my impressions in regard thereto.

First, of the "Antique Class". Some five or six years ago there was a fine working band of young men who pur-sued their studies in the dismal looking basement where casts of Antinous and the the Venus of Milo stand in their glorious beauty. They were punctual in attendance and produced drawings of those famous works rivaling any of a similar character found in any school in Europe. But these were soon separated by various causes. Mr. McKim, a promising young artist, entered the army at the compression of the war. the army at the commencement of the war and fell soon after at the battle of Ball's Bluff. Then Mr. Crepon (painter of 692 in the present exhibition) went to Europe and is now there winning both money reputation for himself in the "Gay City of the Franks." Messrs. D. R. Knight and J. E. Galvan, but shortly returned from the same place, have been particularly unfortunate in the renewal of relations with their "Alma Mater," the contribution of the first remed extint the contribution of the first-named artists to this year's display, being refused by a too rigorous committee for having arrived a day behind the time gracification. ay behind the time specified in the regulations, and that of the latter being selected (in the werds of one in authority) to rank among the pictures that had to be sacrificed. The Messrs, Bensell, Bispham and Fagan withdrew from the class about the same time as the above-named gentlemen; since then it has been gradually dwindling almost into nothingness. At the period I allude to, the "Antique" room was most animated, twenty-five or thirty day-scholars being an average attendance. different now! One or two poor deluded youths, who, in the opinion of their amiable families, are destined to become great artists, sitting melancholy and apart, compose as a general thing the entire class. They seem, too, to be slightly timid when you enter the place, and evince a certain trapidation lest you should examine their copies, which are as good as can be expected from boys who have no instructors but their own feelings to guide them in studying a "Torso" by guide them in studying a "Torso" by Phidias, or the head of a Daphine by Praxiteles. (?) With the "Life Class" things are pretty much the same. During a visit last winter we saw what we will now attempt to describe. In the middle of a room of moderate size, and close to the wall, upon an levated platform, stood an individual in the attitude of the divine Apollo. His figure was certainly intended to be full of the spirit of ancient Greece, but his brogue, for would speak, betrayed the modern origin of the article. A venerable gentleman in spectacles and shirt sleeves, flanked on each side by a bluffy looking young man, who seemed as if they did not quite understand what it all meant, together with a "culled pusson," likewise in spectacles, asleep on a half tilted chair, completed the "ensemble" of the Life Class of the Academy of the Fine Arts. The skeleton hanging by a rope in a corner of the room, from the ceiling seemed to be presiding over the entire at air with every appearance of grim hilarity Now far be it from me to ascribe this fall Now far be it from me to ascribe this fairing off to any unusual neglect of the interests of the schools by the directors. The war and its all absorbing influences have no doubt drawn many from the study of the beautiful to the more exciting pursuit of a soldier's career. And this reason will apply with equal force as an excuse for the little attention the honored president of this institution has of late given to the details concerning the managements of these branches of instruction; the soldiers' families having claims upon his time and atten-tion that surpassed all minor considerations. But peace being again restored, a new and liberal policy should be inaugu-rated, and I trust, if it be followed out in an energetic spirit, that the art schools we were once so proud of shall again be looked upon (as formerly) with admiration by our neighboring cities. In relation to the Li-brary I will say nothing, not considering that a few volumes of Racine, a stray tome of Pugin's Gothic Architecture, and a few to be dignified by such a title. Philada., April, 1866. AN ARTIST. CITY BULLETIN.

THE NAVAL ASYLUM.—The Asylum is one of the institutions and specialties of Philadelphia. It is one of the finest buildings of our naval establishment in all the country, and is probably to be enlarged be-fore long. Some hundreds of decayed or superannuated man-o'-war's-men, from Admiral to common salt, have their homes here; and during the war, thousands of sick or disabled seamen have been treated and cured at this establishment. Very recently a change has been made in the officers of the Asylum. Commodore Engle has been replaced by Rear Admiral Paulding a sureplaced by Kear Admirat rautiting a su-perior officer, who won much credit by his conduct at New York during the war; Cap-tain Turner, a very gentlemanly and com-petent officer, has yielded, in the natural order of time, to Commander Patten, lately commanding a receiving ship at Baltimore: commander Patten, lately commander Patten, lately commanding a receiving ship at Baltimore; Chaplain Wood has given place to Chaplain Jones; and Surgeon Harlan is replaced by Surgeon Maulsby—a gentleman of high professional attainments. The reputation of Rear Admiral Paulding for probity and ability is a guarantee that the affairs of the Asylum will be real! Asylum will be well administered. Com-mander Patten is well qualified to discharge the duties which have been so well performed by Captain Turner.

IMPORTANT ARREST OF COUNTERFEITERS. -Francis Mackey and Joseph Alexander were arrested yesterday afternoon by Capt. S. D. Franklin, a Government detective, at a house on Callowhill street, near Sixteenth, on the charge of being concerned in counterfeiting fractional currency. Mackey was found in the third story front room, in the act of printing 25-cent notes. A press was discovered header was two twenty from the content of the content discovered, besides two twenty-five plates and one fifty-cent; also, a large amount of notes in an unfinished state. Alexander was secured as an aider and abettor. They were taken before Recorder Eneu, who held them to bail to answer—Mackey in $7,000, and Alexander in $5,000.
