Thought and Expression. Upon the opening of the Statistical Section of the British Association, Lord Stanley, the President, offered some excellent advice as to speaking:

"You can say all you have got to say in very few words if you will think it over beforehand. It is not abundance of matter, it is want of preparation, want of exact thought, that makes diffuseness. A man goes round and round his meaning when he gees round and round his meaning when he is not perfectly clear. Again, we don't want preamble or perorations. We are not a school of rhetoric; and in addressing an educated audience a good deal may be taken for granted. Lastly, we only wish to get at the truth of things."

Quintilian has written to the same effect, and goes even further, for he says that a perfect thought will always clothe itself in appropriate language, and that when people suppose that they are in want of words to express themselves they are really in want of thought, have only got hold of a part of a thought instead of the complete thought, and are in difficulty about the clothing of an unformed thing. De Retz says that strong emotions find their utterances in monosyllables, and the language of the poor in grief is often of an earnestness and simmonosylables, and the language of the poor in grief is often of an earnestness and simplicity rising to eloquence. Out of the fullness of the heart the mouth speaketh. It was said of an ancient writer's negligence that it was that of a man studying his matter more than his expression; but, if Quintilian be right, the author had not completely mastered his matter and therefore fell into faults of the author had not completely mastered his matter, and therefore fell into faults of manner. Quintilian may, perhaps, push the proposition a little too far, but it is a safer general rule to suspect the completeness of thought when its delivery in words is difficult, and calls for help. As Lord Stanley well says, "a man goes round and round his meaning when he is not perfectly clear."—London Examiner.
