CITY BULLETIN.

Anniversary of the Mercantile Beneficia Last evening the Academy of Music wa well filled with a fashionable and intelligent audience, on the occasion of the anniversary the Mercantile Beneficial Association The stage was pretty well filled with invited guests, prominent members of the mercantile fraternity, distinguished clergymen and wholic mercantile fraternity. public men.

An orchestra was in attendance, and for more than half an hour treated the vast audience with excellent music.

At half-past seven o'clock W. C. Ludwig,

Esq., introduced the Hon. Alexander G. Cattell, as President of the meeting. [Applause.]
Mr. Cattell, upon taking the chair, marked that a fortnight since, when the committee waited upon him to obtain his committee wated upon him to be consent to act as president of the meeting, he excused bimself on the ground that his threatened engagements seemed to require that he would have to leave home, and thus he would not be able to comply. He thought also that he would not have sufficient time to prepare such remarks as the occasion would require. Finally he did consent, but it was with the understanding consent, but it was with the understanding that he would not be expected to make a speech. It was, therefore, not his purpose to inflict a speech on this occasion. He knew that it was customary upon gentlemen taking the chair as president of public assemblages, to occupy considerable time in making speeches, thus taking up the time that should be appropriated to other and more distinguished man. The custom and more distinguished men. The custom of presidential speech making would be more honorable in the breach than in the observance. [Applause.] He did not at all desire, on the present occasion, to encroach upon any of his distinguished friends to night. But notwithstanding this friends to-night. But notwithstanding this he would beg leave to say a word or two. He thought that he would not do any injustice to any other class of people or profession when he said that he thought the mer-cantile profession exceeded them all. The manufacturer may be considered the bone and sinew of the body politic, but the merand sinew of the body politic, but the merchant was like the heart of the system that promoted life [applause], for it is trade and commerce that give life to business. [Applause.] The prosperity of Philadelphia is indebted to the enterprise, energy, capital, honor and sterling integrity of the mercantile community. The merchants are the great promoters or organizers of the system of internal improvements. This class is of internal improvements. This class is ever foremost in progressing with works of civilization. See where the iron horse travels over the iron track, as though chasing the setting sun [applause], from the Atlantic coast to the peaceful shores of the Pa-cific; from the frozen region of the Nerth to the tropics on the Gulf. [Applause.] Our system of canals and steamers, the twin sisters of civilization, have built up much of the prosperity of Philadelphia. It is the enterprise, the capital, the energy and brains of the merchant to which we, as a people, are indebted for our procperity. It is the province of the merchant to develop the mineral wealth, the fields and forest, to fa-cilitate and cheapen travel, and multiply the means of transportation. To advance these the merchant has ever taken the initiatory step. In whatever tends to promote the interests, the honor and dignity of the community, the merchant has not been un-mindful. But there is yet more work for him. There are yet other fields for his enterprise. He must give a full support to the Southern line of steamers so ably managed by the present board of directors. Let them have half a million or a million of dollars, if necessary, and thus push on the enterprise. If it be desired to recommerce, the transatlantic steamers must be supported, or else the commerce of Phi-ladelphia will become a byword and a reproach, Besides energy and honorable dealings, the merchants are distinguished for their benevolence and charity. In Phila-delphia we have many charitable institutions, asylums, hospitals, deaf and dumb institutions; its homes for the poor, for the orphans. Search the records of these organizations, and you will find them all supported by the benign liberality of the merchants of Philadelphia. [Applause.] The speaker now alluded to that beautiful pile of architecture, the Girard College, as a morniment to the entergrice and liberality. a monument to the enterprise and liberality of a single Philadelphia merchant. [Applause.] The merchants of Philadelphia can certainly claim enterprise and devotion to the country during the long night of civil war. From the time when the glorious flag of America went down at Sumter until it of America went down at Sumter until it was raised again above its shattered walls, the merchants of Philadelphia gave their untiring and unflinching devotion to the whole country. [Applause,] In the darkest hours of our peril they never failed to respond whenever a call was made for men or money. [Applause,] made for men or money. [Applause.] The speaker now appealed to the mercantile community to give all the encouragement they can to promote the interest of the asso-ciation. He alluded to the vicissitudes of life and the novel and peculiar nature of the life of the merchant. The association is not organized to alter the laws of trade, but simply to assist those of the profession who may in the course of time meet with times of adversity. It is an institution that obeys the Scriptural injunction not to let the right hand know what the left does. [Applause.] Even the Board of Directors' do not know who obtains relief; this is confided to a small relief committee. The speaker now addressed the ledies particularly, and in some pleasant remarks, showed how they could assist in promoting the objects of the insti-

The speaker then retired amid much ap-

Mr. Love now read the annual report. The Rev. Alfred Cookman was now introduced. He was received with applause. He said that he felt inclined to acknowledge He said that he felt inclined to acknowledge the deep emotion that overcame him in rising to make an address, and he would also acknowledge that he felt a just pride as a citizen of Philadelphia, because he lived in no mean city. [Applause.] He felt thankful to Mr. Cattell, who, in his remarks, had so beautifully elucidated the system of brotherhood of the Mercantile Benevolent Association, which is so rapidly extending brotherhood of the Mercantile Benevolent Association, which is so rapidly extending, not only in this city, but throughout the world! He was glad that his lot was cast in the city of Brotherly Love, or city of beautiful residences, a city of magnificent monutiful residences, a city of magnificent monuments and memorials of the benevolence, and the enterprise, the charity of her citizens. Rome had its Collescum, Thebes her temples, Egypt her pyramids; and Philadelphia has her Girard College for orphan boys, her homes for friendless children, her asyciums and her Mercantile Benevolent Association. [Applause.] The speaker now ciation. [Applause.] The speaker now alluded to the Roman mother who, in referring to her own children, said, "These are my jewels." May not Philadelphia exclaim, upon beholding all these temples of virtue, the right liberality reference and Christian an npon beholding all these temples of virtue, charity, liberality, refinement and Christianity, that are reared everywhere in this city, from the Delaware to the Schuylkill, "These are my jewels"?

He, the speaker, felt great gratification upon witnessing the spirit of brotherhood that seems to be marching triumphantly throughout the world. May it not tend to awaken the fender memories of individual brotherhood? May it not bring to memory the scenes of youth after we have reached the brotherhood? May it not bring to memory the scenes of youth after we have reached the riper years of old age? Does it not seem at this time that the angel of brotherly love, with the signet of heaven on its brow, is encircling the world with a series of brotherhoods for wise, charitable and Christian purposes? The brotherhood of the merchants is to promote friendship and happiness; then we have other brotherhoods for the promotion of many other good things; we have a great national brotherhood that was defiantly assailed by the demon of slawe have a great national brotherhood that was defiantly assailed by the demon of slavery, a demon that used every art and hellish design to disorganize that national compact; but that demon failed, and we stand to night in a much better condition than ever before. [Tremendous applause.] Universal liberty, impartial justice, equal rights, now constitute the predominant principles of our great national brotherhood. [Great applause.] Thus we present a much stronger and more noble compact than ever before, [Renewed applause.] The speaker now in-troduced the Christian Brotherhood, and expressed his belief that the good time was coming when things on earth will be more like the things in heaven. During these remarks he alluded personally to Mr. Vincent, the great English re-former, the martyred Lincoln, Chief Justice Chase, Gen. Howard and Judge Bond—the able, impartial, noble, patriotic judge whose prompiness saved the city of Baltimore from being deluged with human blood. At the mention of each of the above names the audience applauded. When the name of Judge Bond was pronounced the applause was loud and continued.

Mr. Cookman now addressed himself to the object of the Mercantile Benevolent Association, and he felt sure that the encouragement to its managers would be only renewed during the present year.

The Rev. Phillips Brooks delivered an elequent address. In beginning, he said that he made no claim to being a merchant; but, if devotion to the principle which actuates them is considered, then he felt that his presence was not an intrusion. He would take a somewhat different course in his remarks from those enunciated by the two distinguished gentlemen who had pre-ceded him. He would take a hurried view of the mercantile interests, in a general way, ancient and modern. He aliuded to the condition of commerce in the fifteenth century, when a few creeping ships went along the ceast, bearing a few things inci-dent to the country, and contrasted it with that of the present time. In the time of Virgil, before the Christian era, the poet laureate then proclaimed against commerce and in favor of the isolation of nations, prerequisite to the golden age. Virgil enter-tained this idea; but the poet laureate of Queen Victoria's time, Tennyson, whose poem on commerce was the knitting of all nations, sending forth their ships bearing on every sea the white sails of commerce. The contrast between Virgil and Tennyson who lived 2,000 years apart, was described in language at once eloquent and forcible He considered that the merchant estab lished not only the standard of commerce, but that of national life. It was not the lawyer the scholar, or the minister, that did this; it is the merchant alone. The merchant es-tablishes the standard of modern time; the merchant in India, whom you never saw and never expect to see, trades with you because you have based the standard of commercial relation on the principal of the past few years the merchants established the standard of loyalty. [Applause.] He thought the country owed a debt of gratitude to the merchants of Philadelphia and the merchants of the North. [Great applause.] The merchants strike the key note in all these good works of enterprise liberality, generosity, benevolence and charity. You have not come here to-night charity. You have not come here to night simply to have your ears tickled with a mere reiteration of the good things you have done, nor what you are yet to do. In fact the merchant has a fearful weight of responsibility resting upon him. As he establishes the social standard of society he should be careful about extravagance, be-cause in this he sets the standard for the government of others. The present or coming winter promises to be a very severe one, winter promises to be a very severe one, and he would suggest that in place of erecting a standard of extravagance, the merchant will substitute economy, and with the wealth he possesses not forget the suffering poor of Philadelphia, nor forget the Mercantile Beneficial Association. Mr.

Brooks retired amid great applause,
The audience separated to the music of the national melody, performed by the orchestra.

Yesterday afternoon, about five o'clock, during an alarm of fire, George McAnnaly, aged fifty five years, was run over and killed by the steamer of the Southwark Engine Company, in South street, between Tenth and Eleventh streets. McAnnaly was the driver of a coal cart, and was in the act of dumping a load of coal when he saw the steemer racing up South street. He went in the street to take his horse by the head to turn him out of the way, when the wheel of the Southwark struck him, passing over his stomach. The injured man was carried to the hospital, but died before he arrived there. McAnnaly leaves a wife and a large family. 🔻 FATAL RESULT.—Edward Gay, who was run over by a car of the Tenth and Eleventh Streets Passenger Railway line, near the prison wall, on the morning of the 15th inst., died at the Pennsylvania Hospital yesterday.
