A NEW WAY TO PROTECT SAFES.-A new English invention is described as a "safe It consists of a small apparatus fitted in the upper corner of a safe and near the door, performing the functions of a gas-meter. An ordinary pipe affords a supply gas which passes through the protector into a large iron pipe running from the safe to a lamp in the street. The iron pipe is an air chamber, and serves to contain a gas pipe which is preserved by means of a drill proof coil of steel wire. The lamp is intended to be of unusual appearance, and to give a very brilliant light. The mechanism of the protector is strong, but even a blow on the top of the safe will disconnect the supply of ga and put out the light. The same result would be effected by any tampering with the door or the pipes. In large cities, where safes are numerous within small areas, it is contemplated to employ a special watchman who would, of course, immediately detect the absence of the external signal.

A CASE OF SHARP PRACTICE .- A Sheriff in Manchester, New Hampshire, on the 221 of November, laid an attachment upon some $200 worth of property, and placed a keeper over the same. On Sunday night following, just before midnight, the keepen was seized by four men in disguise, who pulled a bag over his head, took him to the river, and placing him in a boat, ferried him to a small island and left him. Meantime, a writ, which had been previously made and dated Saturday, was put into the hands of another Sheriff, who, visiting the premises, laid an attachment upon the property and put it under keepers. At the same time, the owner had a mortgage executed in favor of the plaintiff in the last case, and the keepers were discharged. Keeper No. 1 having arrived from his moonlight excursion, in formed the first Sheriff of what had occurred and he, under advice of counsel, proceeded to retake possession of the property, and at last accounts held it peaceably, "waiting for something to turn up."
