of the riggers, and named "The Three Harrys," in compliment to her owner, builder, and captain, who all bore the same name. We rounded the lighthouse many yards below the surface of the surrounding country, and having banks in style, though sea-sickness had begun to do its work, and there were some very white faces among us. Then came the question of landing. The sky was get-ting cloudy, and a few drops of rain had fallen, and the wiser part of the com-pany advised our return. The wilder spirifs would not hear of it; we had spirits would not hear of it; we had come out to see Eddystone, and the Ed-dystone we would see, and we carried dystone we would see, and we carried the day. It was not very easy, though the lightmen put out their boat and came to fetch us. The sea was getting rough, and spiteful little waves kept dashing over us and wetting us most uncomfortably. At length we were all safely congregated on the rock for the tide was low, and there was planty of room. there was plenty of room. The prospect around us did not look inviting, the sea was dark and turbulent, and the sky completely clouded now. Rain was falling pretty thickly, and the men hurried us up the steep and slippery ladder with what speed they might, remarking that that there "was not much shelter outthat there "was not much shelter out-side." We half repented of our willful-ness in landing, for the wind began to rise, and "The Three Harrys" got off to a more respectful distance from the sharp rocks. However, they assured us that it would be all clear in an hour or so, and that we should get home quite comfortably, and should get home quite comfortably, and we proceeded to shake outour wet wraps and look about us. We had brought a basket of fresh provisions, always ac-ceptable to the lightkeepers, and a goodly store of tobacco and shuff. We made tea in a most primitive fashion, drinking by turns—for the lighthouse is by no means furnished for a large family—and not heeding the rising storm without. By-and-by however, matters began to look serious; the wind howled, and the waves roared and dashed against the building in a fashion, that seemed to our incorparianced minds to the other and inexperienced minds to threaten us all with destruction. In vain we looked out of the windows for our pretty trim little ship; we could see nothing but blinding spray and foaming, seething water, and some of our party began to be seriously frightened. Hour after hour passed away, and still the storm raged, till even the men began to speculate what had be-come of "The Three Harrys." One said she would have run into this refuge, another into that, and we ardently hoped they would be right. For ourselves we were quite safe, though the huge waves inexperienced minds to threaten us all were quite safe, though the huge waves that struck the walls made the whole place appear to rock and sway with the vibration in a manner that was truly alarming. When the lamps were lit, and the dazzling flood of radiance poured over the water, a curious effect was pro-duced. The light did not appear to affect the water in the immediate vicinity of the rock, but seemed to stream out over our heads in long lines of light, losing itself at last in space. Round the base of the rock the waves dashed and broke with a strange phosphorescent glance that was very re-markable; and when we got used to our position, and less frightened, we were thoroughly interested in looking about us. The wild shricks of the sea-birds formed a hoarse accompaniment to the roar of winds and water; they seemed to be holding a perfect carnival round us, attracted by the light. The storm did > numerous. In the eighteenth century —the golden age of clubs—all this way different. The Addisons and Steels, the Johnsons and Goldsmiths, the Garrieks and Reynoldses, had a very snug idea of clubbing. They did not suffer themselves to freeze or parch in separate groups scattered about a Great Desert of velvet-pile carpet, but gathered together in a room of moderate capacity, where the electric currents of wit could circulate through the whole body of mem-bers. A few familiar friends sitting round the same table, meeting on stated evenings, and breaking up when they liked, gives one the best idea of club life as it was a hundred years ago among the literary and artistic circles. - All the Year Round.
