"The Black Phantom," is the title of a novel published by James Miller, New York. It is written by Charles Shrimpton, and is probably his first effort at romance. The story has at least a merit which all novels do not possess, of meaning well, and the tendency, so far as there is one, is good. It is however, very crude in style and filled with incidents which are either unnatural or wholly unimportant. For sale by J. B. Lippin-cott & Co.

THE FOURTH.—The approaching Fourth of July in Camden, like all its predecessors, will July in Camden, like all its predecessors, will pass away without any special observance. The ity Councils have never wet made an approion or taken official action in celebr ever observance has been given to the day was on behalf of private citizens or by some political association. In almost every town and village adjacent to Canden, some more ditting and marked respect has been given to the day than is usually experienced in Carnden, and in many o these places highly interesting, ceremonies are held. Much complaint is made of Council, that they never take action in reference to celebrating WARNING TO Boys.—The ordinance forbidding all persons bathing within the city limits of Cam-len within certain hours, unless properly clothed, s now in force. The officers are determined to arrest all who violate the ordinance, and those who wish to bathe should bear in mind that the n the morning until eight in the evening. COMMENCED THEIR WORK .- During the past two weeks a number of burglaries have been perpetrated in the vicinity of Camden, and one or band has been prowling about. The officers are on the watch, and those who are arrested will be severely dealt with, if found to be guilty.

THE POOR CANINES .- The dog-catchers in Camden have made war upon the canines in real carnest, and have captured a large number Some of them have been redeemed by their owners paying the imposed fine, but by far the largest portion of them have been killed. -CLOSED On Saturday - Discht the grand strawberry festival, floral fair, &c., in the First Baptist Church of Camden, was closed. B. P. SHILLABER. Mr. Shillaber, though the parent of that antiquated dame, "Mrs. Partington," is only about fifty-three years old himself. He is a heavy, solid, farmer-looking gentleman, an influential man in a local way, a member of the school committee of his district, and alto-a New Hampshire man by birth, but has long been, and still is, a resident of Chelsea, Mass., where he has a pleasant home and family circle. His children, however, are now mostly grown up and married.

Shillaber was a printer in the office of the Boston Post at the time he first essayed literature. His original attempt to achieve print was made with a piece of poetry, which he handed to the editor for insertion in the Post. It was promptly rejected. Shilaber believed that this rejection was due to the fact thathe was "nothing but a typo"-which, it true (and it is hard to believe) shows a curious folly on the part of the editor. He Wrote another poeth at once, and got a friend to take it out to cambricize and mail it to the Post from there. Whether this was a worthier effort or not, it was accepted, the editor supposing it to be from the pen of some student at the college in Cambridge. It was published with lauciatory comment. Soon after this, Shillaber became a reporter on the Post, and while the editor-in-chief was absent from the city. began writing the Mrs. Partington's witticisms. The manuscript was sent into the office as from an outsider, and for a long time the authorship was a profound secret. At length one of the compositors, believing he discovered Shillaber's chirography in the manuscript, charged it upon him. Shillaber did not deny it, and from that time his reputation as a humorist was made. That ever-young juvenile, Ike Partington had his original in Shillaber's own son. He one day discovered his "degenerate scion" in the parlor with a birg incir-knife, complement whittling up the centre-table, quite a handsome piece of furniture. The instincts of the stern parent becameoverruled by those of the humorist; the ludi-crous aspect of the affair so filled Shillaber with laughter that the mischievous youth got off lightly. From this moment "Ike" had 164 being. The boy's pranks long furnished the father with brilliant suggestions; but now the boy is a married man. "Ike," however, has boy is a married man. "Ike," however, has drank his fill at the fountain of perennial. been disinterested and pattorie."
