As soon as Marquez heard of the betraval of Maximilian to the Liberals, he opened the documents and found among work to do, and instructions as to the manner flowers. them an abdication of the Mexican throne in favor of young Iturbide, whereupon Marquez mmediately proclaimed Iturbide Emperor under the Regency of the Empress Carlotta. The first Iturbide was born in Mexico in

Mexican armies, in various capacities, until in the year 1819 he was promoted to the command of an army designed to operate in the south of Mexico. While in this position, he matured a plan for the emancipation of Mexico from the yoke of Spain, which was consummated without bloodshed, and so complete was the revolution, that upon the arrival of the Viceroy, General from Spain, the county was so entirely with Iturbide, that a treaty was concluded between the two nations. Shortly afterward, the Congress declared the crown hereditary in the family of Iturbide. and gave to his sons the title of Princes. Gradually, however, the efforts of rival chiefs to produce disaffection throughout the empire were successful, and on the 20th of March, 1823, Iturbide, finding his cause hopeless, tendered his resignation of the crown and left the country. A decree was passed forbidding him to return. He did so, however, in disguise, was arrested, taken to Padilla and shot. His widow and children came to Philadelphia to live, and in this city his sons were educated. One of these died last year in New York city, unmarried. The son of his brother had been adopted by the childless Maximilian soon after his assumption of the Imperial crown, and it is this boy, grandson of Augustin I., who is now declared

It is hardly probable that this claim will be recognized by the Juarez government, and this alliance to Maximilian may result in personal injury or the loss of his life; but he will form a nucleus around which the remnant of the Imperial party can rally and perhaps prolong the contest for a brief period.
