He was satisfied that he could hold the place for six mopths, having an ample supply of ammunition, with ten batteries of artillery, numbering in all about seventy guns. Influenced, however, by the serious representations of the merchants, who assembled for the purpose, that their interests were at stake, owing to a want of communication with the interior, he consented to embark his troops on condition that they should leave the town with all the military bonors, and that the Legion should receive $20,000 with which to pay their expenses. These terms were accepted by the Connecticut, appeared and took their seats as Consuls, and accordingly the troops embarked on the 27th, with all their arms, accourtements, &c., leaving in the city the rest of the garrison, consisting of about 1,300 Mexicans.

We say the terms were accepted, but this is not strictly correct, for the Legion received only $3.000, making about $11 for each of the troops, and from $15 to $90 for the officers—"an amount," in the words of our informant, "too large with which to die, but too small upon which to live."
