THE SURRATT CASE. The result of the Surratt trial has not taken the community much by surprise. There has been so little faith in the integrity of a Washington jury, in any case in which the rebellion was involved, that the announcement of the discharge of the Surratt jury for non-agreement has been received with little excitement. The result of this protracted and costly trial is a new demonstration of the wellknown fact that the time has not yet come to depend upon civil processes for the punishment of crimes connected with the rebellion. Four of the jury born upon free soil, followed the law and the testimony and advocated a conviction. All the rest resolutely shut their eyes and ears to the law and the testimony, and resolved that a Southern rebel should not die a felon's death if they could help it. The public is told that "the jury disagreed on the question of the absence of Surratt from Washington at the time of the assassination of the President, and that they were entirely agreed upon this point, that had he been indicted for conspiracy, he would have been most grievous complaint respecting the negro "manly article" on "the New Crisis."
