EVENING BULLETIN. Friday, September 20, 1867.

THE COMING STRUGGLE. Europe is filled with rumors of war. General apprehension and uneasiness seem to exist in political and financial circles, and while none can directly account for the existence of this feeling, it is evident that the attltude of the great powers is decidedly warlike, and that grave fears are entertained of an outbreak of hostilities in one quarter or another, which shall be the signal for a war in which the whole continent will be involved. It is officially announced that the Salzburg Conference had no political meaning, and Napoleon has himself assured France and the world of his peaceable intentions; and yet he is massing troops at various points, and working the armories to their utthreatened intervention of Napoleon in behalf of the Pope, and the Italian people are in arms and eager to advance upon Rome at the first attempt at interference. Prussia, the jealous rival of France, is striving to begin again and cause fresh trouble, the authorities not having complied with their agreement to dismantle the fortress, and Bismarck having begun already to grumble cratic triumphs. The Czar has demanded, in a peremptory vote cast for a Democrat is inevitably misinmanner of Turkey, the cession of Crete to terpreted into an endorsement of Johnson. that the policy of the Czar contemplates the tuated by but one consideration, the overbable that any of the great powers, despite shape such reform may profitably take. But In warlike matters Engtand is out of the question; Austria, immediately interested in the preservation of the integrity of the Sublime Porte, will not dare, in its present weak condition, to offer resistance to Russia.
