Au English paper has this story from Australia:

"Three tiny boys, colony born, of Daylesford, in Victoria, started into the bush to look for some runaway goats. The ediest was only seven: but Australian lad3 and lasses have a continent for a playground, and nothing was feared. When, however, the little ones missed the dinner hour, and then tea, the parents grew anxious, find searched the neighborhood in vain. Night fell, and with the aid of the local police the search was extended, and though it lasted till the morning the children were still missing At dawn a storekeeper came in who had seen the small wanderers on the road over night; and then a boy, who had given them the right direction as he passed. This was all that could, be gained throughout the second day; but now the little scattered community had heard of the loss, and was on the leart. The quartz miners put their tools by and went out into the bush; so did the sweyers at the steam mill; and community had heard of the local of the cost of the alert. The quartz miners put their body and well the steam milk and so did they would not seem the seem of the lessly lost and must have laid down to die in the wilds. It will be hereafter a colonial tale to match our British 'Babes in the Wood,' with the blue'bird and the bell bird for 'cock-robin,' and the generous Daylesford folk to make a pleasant verse instead of the 'wicked uncle.'
