Walt Whitman has arisen on the States to point the way to new literatures. He is the plain pioneer, pickaxe on shoulder, working and "roughing." The daintier gentlemen will follow, and build where he is delving.

Whitman himself would be the first to deadunce those loose young gentlemen who admire him vaguely because he is loud and massive gross and colossal not for the sake.

Bateman's "Leah" must be elevated to the highest position in the theatrical world. That elevation has been practically recognized by the people of Liverpool; for, with all our experience of theatrical publics, we never remember audiences so crowded, so enthusiastic, and so appreciative, as have been those which have filled this establishment this week. He is the voice of which America stood most in need—a voice at which ladies scream and gigmen titter, but which clearly pertains to a man who means to be heard. He is the clear forerunner of the great American poet, long longed for, often prophesied, but not perhaps to be beheld till the vast American democracy has subsided a little from its last and grandest struggle. Honor, in his generation, is, of course, his due, but he does not seem to solicit honor. He is too thoroughly alive to care about being tickled into activity, too excited already to be much moved by finding himself that most badgered of functionaries, the recognized Sir Oracle.

The ladies of the party found it still more difficult to tear themselves away from the show-rooms or shop, when once there. For beauty of design and delicacy of execution the Thal work quite equals if it does not excel any French work. America is the great purchaser of these beautiful goods, and France after her; and we fancy that much of the embroidery that is sold in Paris as french, is in reality the work of the nimble fingers of some Thal madden. This embroidery is rather more highly paid than the tambour work for curtains. What is called the negroes for voting in favor of a convention that they are systematically prospectively for the port.
