[Cheers.] What is that agency? Is it not that of one language in common with the two nations? [Cheers.] It is in the one mother tongue that their poets must sing, their philosophers must reason, and their orators must argue for truth or contend for power. Does not history show us that it is always through one language in or contend for power. Does not history show us that it is always through one hanguage in common that differences of origin are welded together? I see before me a gentleman distin-guished for the manner in which he has brought together all that is most modern in senti-ment with all that is most scholastic in thought and language—permit me to say—Mr. Matthew Arnold. [Cheers.] I appeal to him, I appeal to you all. Am I right when I say that that is the cause cementing together all difference of original cause cementing together, all difference of ori-gin, that is the cause why Etruscans and Oscaps, and Sabines and Romans became one family, as Latins once, as Italians now? Before the influence of a language in common, have not all an-cestral differences in England between Briton and Saxon, and Dane and Norman melted away? Hear, hear.] And by the same owninotent away? [Hear, hear.] And by the same owninotent agency will not all differences of origin equally melt away in the nurseries of American mothers extracting the earliest lessons for their children from our the earliest lessons for their children from our own English bible, and in the schools of precep-tors, who must resort to the same model of han-guage whenever they bid thir pupils rival the prose of Macaulay and Prescott, or emulate the verse of Tennyson and Longfellow? [Cheers.] Now it seems to me that nothing can more quicken the sense of that relationship which a hanguage in common creates than the presence and the voice of a writer equally honored and beloyed in the Old World and the suit beloyed in the Old World and the

New. [Cheers.] I cannot but think that wherever our American kinsfolk, welcome that presence or hang spell-bound on that volce. they will irresistibly feel how much there is of fellowship and unison between the hearts of America and England.
